Chicago's Union Station, which opened in 1925, would be updated and redeveloped under plans unveiled Monday.

UNION STATION PLANS IN MOTION

Redevelopment could start by spring, adding 7 stories if project receives zoning approval

A more than $1 billion redevelopment of Union Station could begin as soon as next spring, starting with a seven-story glass-and-steel addition on top of its main building.

More than a year after they were chosen by property owner Amtrak to reconfigure and build onto the massive rail station, Chicago-based developers Riverside Investment & Development and Convexity Properties on Monday night unveiled new details of their proposal to add a hotel, apartments, offices and new retail tenants.

Plans for the project's first phase were outlined in the first public meeting held by Ald. Brendan Reilly, 42nd, the initial step in the process toward gaining the alderman's blessing, and eventually zoning approval from the City Council.

If the plan is approved by the city and the developers successfully implement their vision, Metra and Amtrak train passengers would experience a more vibrant Great Hall concourse and more options for eating, drinking and shopping. It also would bring hundreds of residents and hotel guests to the property.

Disruptions to commuters are likely to be minimal during the first phase's two-year construction process, said John O'Donnell, Riverside's CEO. Last year, more than 34 million Metra passengers and more than 3 million Amtrak passengers used Union Station.

"The idea is to make this an active and animated public space," O'Donnell said. "We want to make this an important destination 12 months a year."

Amtrak announced in May 2017 that it chose the Riverside-led venture from a field of applicants. Some aspects of the plan have changed since preliminary details were unveiled at that time.

The existing eight-story main building, or "headhouse," would nearly double in height to 245 feet, from its current 125 feet.

New foe complicates Rauner's bid

Conservative Party candidate could be re-election obstacle

Downstate state Sen. Sam McCann on Monday filed to run as a third-party candidate for governor, creating a potential obstacle to Republican Gov. Bruce Rauner's re-election bid if McCann can stay on the ballot.

A Republican of Plainview in central Illinois, McCann is a supporter of organized labor who often has been at odds with Rauner. He survived a primary re-election challenge backed by the governor two years ago.

Now the relatively unknown McCann will run as the new Conservative Party's governor candidate, turning in roughly 65,000 petition signatures to the State Board of Elections in Springfield on Monday. Third-party candidates need 25,000 valid signatures, and he predicted he has enough to survive any potential challenge to his candidacy.

With beads of sweat rolling off his forehead after he wheeled in a dolly loaded with signed petitions, McCann characterized his run as a long shot but said it was about challenging the "political elite" in the Democratic and Republican parties.

"The Democrats and Republicans control the process, and they don't want to share that," said McCann, 48. "And the problem with that is the people pay the

2 CPS principals removed

Investigations ongoing into how sexual abuse allegations handled

Principals at two prominent Chicago high schools were removed from their duties Monday, pending what officials described as ongoing investigations into how the administrators handled sexual abuse allegations.

Sheldon House, the principal of Simeon Career Academy, was removed amid a newly disclosed allegation of sexual abuse lodged against an unnamed school volunteer. District officials said that allegation was discovered during an audit of "systemic issues" in the school's background check process.

Goode STEM Academy Principal Armando Rodriguez was reassigned from his post after a teacher at the building was removed from duty earlier this month following an allegation of sexual abuse of a student.

"As a result of district-led investigations into allegations of sexual abuse, two CPS principals were removed from their positions today due to initial findings that suggest they did not effectively safeguard their students," Chicago Public Schools CEO Janice Jackson said in a statement.

"Investigations into both cases remain ongoing, and we will keep the school communities updated as this process moves forward," she said.

The district announced the administrators' removal barely more than a day before a scheduled Chicago Board of Education vote to change how CPS investigates allegations of sexual misconduct by adults against students, as well as new practices that would require employees to inform child welfare authorities and supervisors of "any inter-

Decision aims 'to maintain family unity,' official says

McALLEN, Texas — U.S. Border Patrol agents have stopped handing parents over to the Justice Department for prosecution when they are caught crossing the border illegally with their children, the head of U.S. Customs and Border Protection said Monday.

The statement by Customs and Border Protection Commissioner Kevin McAleenan marked a significant step back from the "zero tolerance" policy that the Trump administration had pursued for the last two months, and resulted in more than 2,000 children being taken from their parents. President Donald Trump issued an order last week to stop separating families.

"We're not prosecuting those parents," McAleenan said, "because of guidance in the (executive order) to maintain family unity."

His statement came as White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders said the government was starting to "run out of space" to house people apprehended crossing the border. "We're simply out of resources," Sanders said.

At the same time, however, the administration

MANUEL BALCE CENETA/AP

President Donald Trump had rung up 3,251 false or misleading claims by May 31, Washington Post fact-checking found.

Trump's lies not ruining him. Why?

RON GROSSMAN

I would like to think that Donald Trump has finally told one lie too many. He searched high and wide for someone to blame when his policy of taking children away from parents caught surreptitiously crossing the border backfired, big time.

Before throwing in the towel and ending the practice with a scratch of his pen, Trump said Democrats had to clean up the mess. Their legislation created it, he claimed.

That was a double whopper. Since there is no such legislation, it couldn't be the Democrats' fault. Then he claimed that dangerous criminals are posing as loving parents in order to sneak into our country. That was a riff on the Greek legend of the Trojan horse, and as Trump didn't offer a scintilla of evidence, it also belongs on a library shelf labeled "fiction."

The fact is that Trump feels no need to prove even his wiggliest claims. Still, I've gone on doggedly hoping that the sheer magnitude of his lies would eventually give his supporters second thoughts.

The number of Trump's false or misleading claims reached 3,251 by May 31, according to The Washington Post's fact-checker database. Shortly thereafter, the Gallup Poll found that 87 percent of Republicans gave him a favorable rating.

To me, that means the time has come to look the data square in the eye. It accords with what history teaches: What one person sees as an obvious lie appears to another as an undeniable truth.

How do I know? The Bible tells me so. Christians read the New Testament account of Jesus being born of a virgin as literally true. Jews, whose ancestors produced the Old Testament, find the idea incredible, and Muslims deny Jesus' crucifixion.

That suggests a general rule: When hearing about a subject to which we are emotionally committed, we often don't judge it against the standard of objective truth. We accept it if it's compatible with ideas we hold sacred, and reject it if it isn't.

Nazi Germany offers a case in point. Hitler came to power by preaching that Germans were the "master race." That entitled them to seize control of nations inhabited by the inferior beings. Yet the Fuhrer and his buddies didn't look like supermen. Hitler had a funny little mustache that gave him the appearance of a clown. Charlie Chaplin so satirized him in "The Great Dictator," giving movie audiences giggling fits.

But Germans didn't see the reality of Hitler's gang. Mesmerized by the pack of lies he was feeding them, they marched into Russia. There millions perished, many wearing summer uniforms in a bitter-cold winter. Hitler said they'd be home before the snow fell.

To grasp Trump's hold over his followers requires focusing less on his lies themselves than the story into which he has woven them. By that worldview, ordinary Americans have been hoodwinked by a snobbish elite that has profited at the expense of workaday folks. He's their champion.

A handful of supporting examples lend just enough credence to his worldview.

For example, pundits have decried

Trump's broadsides against NAFTA. The last three letters of the acronym stand for "free trade agreement." Yet Canada imposes astronomical tariffs on milk imports. Why shouldn't an American dairy farmer cry, "Liar, liar pants on fire!" when hearing the word NAFTA?

The lie ringing in the ears of his supporters is that free trade is a fair fight. You're not likely to win that person over no matter how many holes can be knocked into the rest of Trump's story by wielding an ax of truth.

Yes, Trump lies with remarkable ease and predictable regularity. He said he didn't know anything about hush money paid to actress Stormy Daniels. Then said he did know — without prefacing his revised account with "I seem to have misspoken myself."

Be that as it may, just throwing that up against Trump isn't likely to win an election. People need something to believe in when they step into a voting booth.

They want to hear a compelling story.

Something like: "Once upon a time, Democrats saw that people were hurting, so they created Social Security. Later, they saw that old people couldn't afford a doctor, so they created Medicare. Sure, they've dropped the ball, sometimes. But they own up to that. So how about I tell you what other nitty-gritty human problems they'd like to tackle. Here's one ..."

What Koko, the signing gorilla, taught us

DAHLEEN GLANTON

Koko, the signing gorilla, made me uncomfortable.

She was too intelligent, too intuitive, too human. I was wary of her, yet in awe of her.

What disturbed me most is what Koko represented. She was the antithesis of my Protestant upbringing. It was impossible to read about her or watch videos of her and not wonder whether the human species had evolved from primates like her.

For someone with a Southern Baptist background such as mine, the concept of evolution goes against everything we were taught about man's creation from the moment we were old enough to attend Sunday school.

While life has taken me further away from my religious roots than others in my family, there are some topics that simply are not debatable as far as the elders are concerned. Evolution versus creationism is one of them.

But aside from the issues of science and theology, Koko was a phenomenon that could not be ignored. Regardless of one's religious beliefs, she was a gift to humanity, and anyone who paid attention could have learned volumes from her.

Koko was a great communicator, a student of the world and an extraordinary teacher.

She was much smarter than some people I know. She could do things that other animals could not. Heck, she could do things most people could not.

When she was just a year old, Koko began learning sign language. She became so proficient at it that she was once able to communicate that her mouth hurt and let a doctor know how painful it was on a scale of one to 10.

I still have trouble figuring out how to answer that when my doctor asks.

Though she was not the only animal that has learned to sign, Koko's extensive vocabulary — more than 1,000 signs and 2,000 words developed over her 46 years — helped to make her, by far, the most famous.

PBS PHOTO

It is ironic that this wise western lowland gorilla born on Independence Day would die in her sleep during a week when America was at one of its lowest points. At a time when our nation seemed void of compassion, the death of a gorilla that was loved throughout the world reminded us of the importance of empathy.

Koko knew how to communicate with those who were different from her. She cared about others, and she showed it openly. Simply by being herself, she forced us to think about things in a way we never had.

Though she was surrounded by human love, she longed for a gorilla family. She often "talked" to her handler and close friend, Penny Patterson, about longing to have a baby. When she could not conceive, she adopted kittens.

Not only did Koko give us insight into ourselves, she was the primary ambassador for all gorillas, prompting us to see them not just as apes but also as gentle and caring individuals with the capacity to learn, communicate with us and grieve for us.

Koko had a rare capacity to connect with people. She captivated us with her inherent ability to receive and return affection, her capacity for nurturing and her empathy in times of tragedy. These are qualities that would benefit every human being.

When I learned of Koko's death, I felt a deep sense of loss. I never met Koko, though she was near the top of the list of "celebrities" I would have most liked to have lunch with.

I wanted to talk with her and laugh with her, the way actor Robin Williams did when he visited her home at the Gorilla Foundation in 2001. She seemed to take a liking to him quickly, having watched one of his movies before his arrival.

Death was not a stranger to Koko. When one of her pet kittens was struck and killed by a car, she whimpered with grief and talked about the death for several days. Her close companion, a male gorilla named Michael, had died too. She didn't smile again for six months — until Williams came to visit.

When she learned of the actor's suicide in 2014, she mourned, signing to Patterson, "Cry Lip" (Lip was Koko's sign for woman.) At the end of the day she became very somber, with her head bowed and her lip quivering, according to the foundation.

She seemed to know that her own death was near too. Koko seemed to say as much in her last conversation with Patterson.

"She was looking a little sad and worried, and she looked straight at me and held two signs," Patterson told ABC News. "One was 'patient' and the second one was 'old.' So she was trying to explain, 'Hey, I'm getting on.'"

Koko seemed to understand that life is only temporary, and she was determined to live hers to the fullest.

This gorilla was an excellent example of what it means to be an exceptional human being, regardless of how we got here.

New housing department is proposed

Recent Tribune report highlighted city's shortcomings

BY GREGORY PRATT AND JEFF COEN
Chicago Tribune

Mayor Rahm Emanuel's administration on Monday proposed creating a new city department to focus on affordable housing, an election-season move officials said would sharpen the city's efforts on the issue.

The proposed housing department would be responsible for implementing Emanuel's strategy, and the mayor's office said he will call on a steering and advisory committee "to create a new and transformative vision for housing, and the new department will reflect that vision." The announcement was met with surprise and skepticism by some housing advocates.

Emanuel's proposal comes days after the Tribune highlighted shortcomings in the city's approach to affordable housing in gentrifying neighborhoods. It showed that the number of affordable residences built is running below City Hall projections by some measures, and the fees paid by many developers to fund affordable housing have been mostly steered away from gentrifying neighborhoods.

It could be a delicate issue for the re-election-seeking mayor, who has assured families there would still be a place for them in neighborhoods suddenly filling with young professionals.

"The Chicago Department of Housing will bring all of our work to make housing more affordable and accessible for all Chicagoans under one roof," Emanuel said in a statement unveiling the proposal. "Every resident of Chicago deserves a great place to call home, and this new department will give the city a specialized resource to ensure housing remains affordable for anyone who wants to live, work and raise a family in Chicago."

City officials will work with developers in neighborhoods "to implement existing tools and create new strategies where needed," the mayor's office said. Emanuel's budget "will outline the structure and funding for the new department," the mayor's office said, including an increase in staffing and resources.

Chicago had a distinct housing department before 2009, but it has since been consolidated into what is now the Department of Planning and Development.

Ald. Joe Moore, 49th, who chairs the city's Committee on Housing and Real Estate, applauded Emanuel's plan but said it "never should've been merged in the first place."

"Housing's too important to give it short shrift,"

Moore said.

The proposal was greeted with some skepticism from community groups. H. Kapp-Klote, communications director for neighborhood group ONE Northside, said the organization hadn't heard about it before the announcement.

And ONE Northside member Istvan Fekete said, "Rahm's efforts are a day late and a dollar short."

"He has dropped the ball on this for years, and the community does not trust him when it comes to affordable housing," Fekete said. "He needs to let the community provide the policy framework they want. Not have it dictated to them by City Hall."

But in a statement released by the city, La Casa Norte Executive Director Sol Flores said she supports Emanuel's decision.

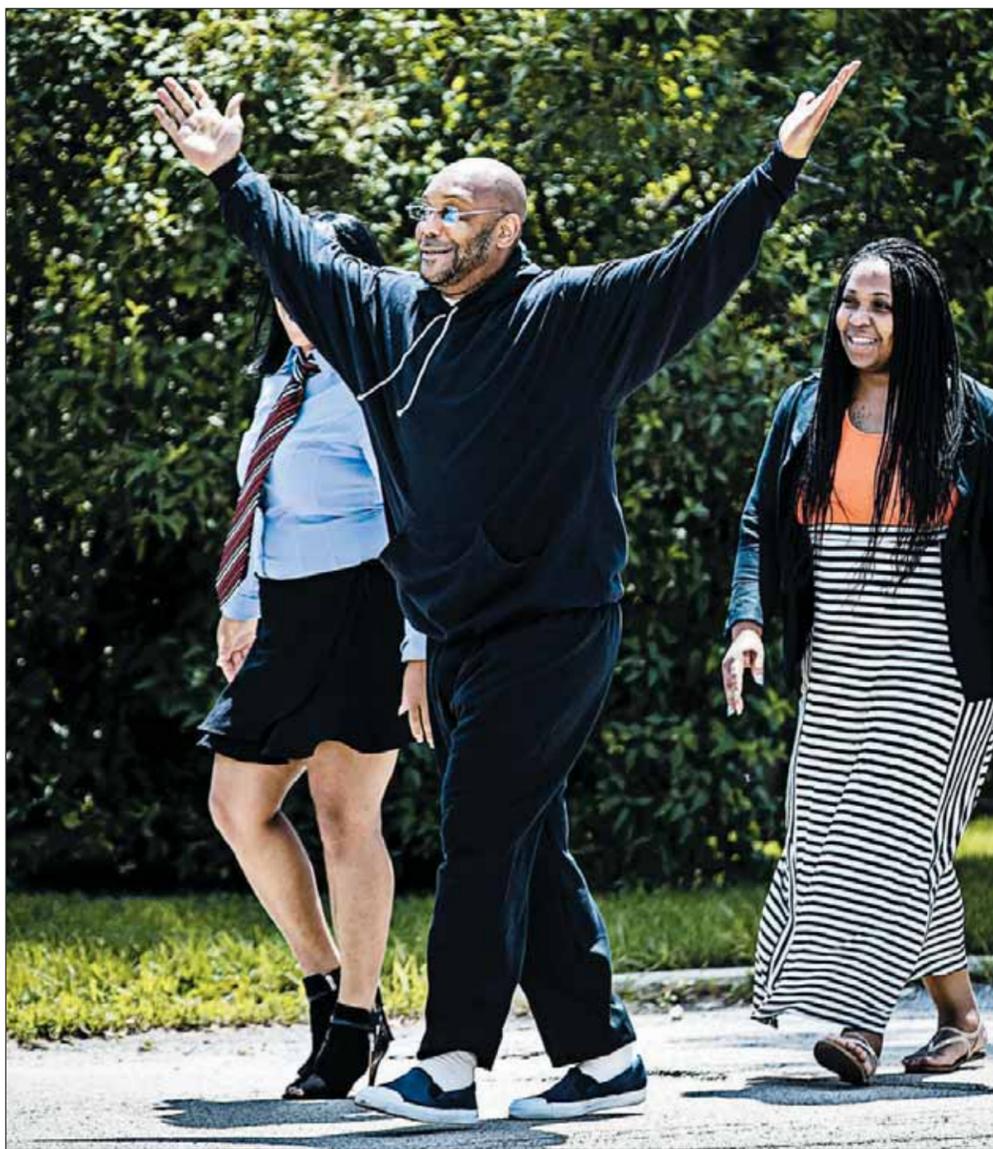

"I support the mayor's decision to establish a city department focused on housing development, affordability and policy, especially for those most vulnerable amongst us including homeless young people, seniors, people with disabilities and families," said Flores, whose group helps youth and families confronting homelessness and who ran unsuccessfully for U.S. Rep. Luis Gutierrez's congressional seat. "A department with a sharp focus on housing affordability and development would serve our neighborhoods well and therefore the city on continuing to be a welcoming place for all."

A centerpiece of Emanuel's strategy to keep families in gentrifying areas has been the 2015 Affordable Requirements Ordinance, which toughened Daley-era rules requiring developers include residences that rent for less than the market rate in the area when they put up new buildings, or pay fees in lieu of building those affordable units.

But most of the units that are being produced are too small for families who find themselves priced out. Housing advocates said that when rents go up and families go looking for a new home in their neighborhoods, they are having difficulty and are facing the possibility of having to move to a more distant, and sometimes more dangerous, neighborhood.

Among other programs, the proposed department will handle the Chicago Opportunity Investment Fund, a program Emanuel announced last week that is designed to offer developers low-cost financing through a combination of city and private funds to buy and preserve existing apartment buildings in areas where rents are increasing, as long as they agree to keep 20 percent of the units affordable for 15 years.

Inmate released after tainted case dropped

Man spent decade locked up on counts linked to corrupt ex-Chicago cop Watts

An inmate walked free Monday from state prison a few hours after Cook County prosecutors dropped gun charges against him because of links to a tactical team of Chicago police officers led by corrupt ex-Sgt. Ronald Watts.

Anthony McDaniels, 50, greeted his sister and niece with long embraces as he stepped from Stateville Correctional Center near Joliet about 2:20 p.m.

McDaniels appeared overwhelmed as half a dozen reporters tried to question him as he exited the prison walls. His attorney stressed that McDaniels had learned only a few hours earlier that he would be freed after nearly a decade in custody.

McDaniels expressed gratitude for his family and called what happened to him "a shame."

He said he hadn't had a chance to consider what to do with his sudden freedom.

"I'm still trying to process this part right here," he said.

McDaniels, who has been in custody since 2008, is the 24th person to have his Watts-related conviction thrown out of court because of the corruption.

Watts is a former public housing officer notorious for shaking down drug dealers for protection money and pinning false cases on those who wouldn't play ball.

McDaniels' case is noteworthy because he alleges other members of Watts' crew pinned a gun on him after he refused their demands that he pay a bribe.

McDaniels alleged he was approached for the bribe by then-Officer Kallatt Mohammed, who was sent with Watts to federal prison in 2013 for stealing money from a drug courier who had been working as an FBI informant.

At a brief hearing Monday at the Leighton Criminal Court Building, prosecutors announced they had completed a review of the case and would no longer oppose McDaniels' bid for a new trial.

Judge Arthur Hill then tossed out McDaniels' conviction and prosecutors dropped the charges.

McDaniels' family

smiled and waved at him from the courtroom gallery on word that he would be freed.

It was an emotional day for McDaniels and his family, according to his sister, LaShawn. His father died while he was in prison, and his mother and son are both dealing with health issues, she said.

Her first priority will be to keep her brother busy, LaShawn McDaniels said.

"I just think he needs to travel the world. He needs to see things. He's missed a lot in this decade," she said. "We're going to make sure he eats whatever he wants."

Watts and his team of tactical officers were accused of orchestrating a reign of terror at the now-raised Ida B. Wells public housing complex on the South Side.

The scandal has prompted a wave of convictions to be thrown out. Fifteen men had their convictions tossed on the same day in November in what is believed to be Cook County's first mass exoneration.

After that dramatic move, police Superintendent Eddie Johnson ordered that 15 officers who were once part of Watts' allegedly corrupt tactical team be removed from street duties and placed on paid desk duty while the Civilian Office of Police Accountability investigated their conduct from years ago. That investigation continues, a COPA spokesman said on Monday.

Meanwhile, the state's attorney's office has identified 10 officers with ties to Watts whom it will no longer call as prosecution witnesses because of concerns about their credibility.

McDaniels alleged that after he refused to pay a bribe, Mohammed and Officer Douglas Nichols planted a gun on him. The two officers as well as Officer Manuel Leano fabricated police reports and later lied at McDaniels' trial, McDaniels alleged.

According to court papers, Nichols and Leano were among the officers placed on desk duty as well as those barred from testifying for prosecutors.

About 500 convictions linked to Watts and Mohammed dating to 2004 need to be checked out by authorities, according to McDaniels' lawyer, Joshua Tepfer, of the Exoneration Project at the University of Chicago Law School.

Partner of officer who fatally shot 2 takes stand

Cop backs key parts of Rialmo's account in suits over 2015 Christmastime deaths

BY DAN HINKEL
Chicago Tribune

A Chicago police officer took the witness stand Monday and corroborated key parts of his partner's account of a controversial 2015 shooting that killed a 19-year-old and a bystander.

Officer Anthony LaPalermo testified that Quintonio LeGrier rushed at the officers with an aluminum baseball bat as they responded to a domestic incident on the West Side early the morning after Christmas 2015. His partner, Officer Robert Rialmo, shot LeGrier and also struck 55-year-old bystander Bettie Jones, who lived downstairs from LeGrier's father.

LaPalermo's testimony came as the trial over lawsuits stemming from the shooting kicked off its second week at the Daley Center courthouse. The city reached a tentative $16 million settlement with the Jones family before trial but made no such agreement with the LeGrier family.

The LeGrier family finished calling witnesses Monday, and the city's lawyers started calling their witnesses.

LaPalermo testified that he pulled his gun and considered shooting, but Rialmo was between the officer and LeGrier. Asked about the moments before the shooting, LaPalermo said, "I thought my head was getting split open."

LaPalermo, however, told jurors he didn't see crucial elements of the incident, in part because he jumped backward off the home's porch and was looking down during the shooting.

Questions from attorneys also highlighted differences between the officers' accounts. LaPalermo said he did not see LeGrier swing the bat. The officer also said he did not hear Rialmo tell LeGrier to drop the bat, as Rialmo said he did.

Earlier in the day, LeGrier's mother, Janet Cooksey, briefly took the stand. Asked what she misses about him, she said "everything." "I miss hugging him. I miss him telling me that he loved me," she said.

The ongoing trial has been complicated by the fact that Rialmo hired his own lawyer, Joel Brodsky, who made the unusual move of suing both the LeGrier estate and the city. His litigation alleges that LeGrier was to blame for the shooting and the city failed to properly train and equip Rialmo.

On Monday, Brodsky said he had withdrawn the part of his litigation that targeted the city, so it will not be decided by the jury, though he did not withdraw his claim against the LeGrier estate. Brodsky said he believed that presenting evidence that Rialmo was poorly trained might have worked in favor of the plaintiffs, who are trying to prove the shooting was unwarranted. Brodsky said he hopes to resolve his claim against the city "in a different form."

The case has been politically heated since it took place just a month after Mayor Rahm Emanuel was forced by a judge to release video of an officer shooting black teen Laquan McDonald 16 times.

Rialmo, who is on paid desk duty, also remains under investigation for a December 2017 bar fight.

Officials, residents urge Rauner to veto water act amendment

Watchdog: Private companies could grow unchecked, hitting residents' wallets

BY PATRICK M. O'CONNELL AND CECILIA REYES
Chicago Tribune

Flanked by state senators and the mayors of Homer Glen and Bolingbrook, the Citizens Utility Board urged Gov. Bruce Rauner to veto an amendment to the Illinois Water Systems Viability Act on Monday, saying the provisions are bad for consumers and a boon for private water companies.

The consumer watchdog group said the bill will allow private companies to grow unchecked at the expense of Illinois residents. The morning event was held at the Village Hall of southwest suburban Homer Glen, where residents served by Illinois American Water complained of skyrocketing monthly bills.

Introduced earlier this year by Rep. Nick Sauer, R-Lake Barrington, the bill would renew the act's amendments for another 10 years and remove a 7,500-connection cap on the size of water systems that private companies can buy. That would, consumer advocates fear, increase the chance of a monopoly on the resource.

"Getting rid of the cap on the size of the system lays bare the utilities' profiteering motivations," said Bryan McDaniel, director of governmental affairs for CUB. "That will speed up the pace of acquisition. The bigger the system, the higher the price tag."

The legislation, House Bill 4508, passed in the Senate but failed to obtain a veto-proof majority in the House. Rauner has until mid-August to sign or veto the bill.

"This legislation is a bad deal for customers, and it would make it much easier for private companies to purchase water systems and then to dramatically increase the customer rates," said state Sen. Sue Rezin, R-Morris, herself a customer of Illinois American Water.

The Tribune calculated and verified the costs associated with 5,000 gallons of Lake Michigan water use for customers of Illinois American and Aqua Illinois. On average, Illinois American charges $74.95 and Aqua Illinois $53.16. The two companies serve about 52,000 customers in the Chicago area, and their prices were 20 to 70 percent higher than the 2017 price tag a resident under a publicly managed water system would pay for the same Lake Michigan water, taking service fees and other base charges into account.

Aqua Illinois said in a statement that the bill allows the company to improve water quality and system reliability, enhances fire protection across the state and will help struggling systems gain compliance with Illinois Environmental Protection Agency regulations. The viability act, Aqua said, enables communities to focus on other priorities, and the company emphasized that even with the amendment, municipalities retain control over whether to sell their water system to a private operator.

Signed into law in 2013, the Illinois Water Systems Viability Act allows private water utilities to buy out water utilities and spread the costs across its existing ratepayers. The legislation is part of the Public Utilities Act, which designates the Illinois Commerce Commission as the gatekeeper of "reasonable" rate increases and a competitive energy market.

Under the current bill, the commission is allowed to reject a pending municipal acquisition if it's not in the public interest, Marianne Manko, director of public affairs at the commission, said via email. Manko noted, however, that a decision by a municipality's local leaders to privatize makes the move "very difficult" to reverse.

With regard to size, "it's conceivable the Commission would reject such a transaction," she wrote, if the acquiring utility "would find it difficult or impossible to provide safe, adequate and reliable service to a greatly-expanded customer base."

Rezin said there needs to be a cap on future rate increases, which she lamented as already "out of control," and said the length of the amendment — 10 years — is far too long.

Residents of Homer Glen, with a population of about 24,000, paid $85.58 a month per 5,000 gallons, not including sewer charges — a figure higher than all but one of the Chicago area's publicly managed systems that use Lake Michigan water, according to a survey conducted by the Tribune for its 2017 series "The Water Drain." The average bill for 5,000 gallons in that survey was $44. The embattled southwest suburb filed an official complaint with the Illinois Commerce Commission regarding its water rates in 2016.

"You know, it's outrageous, and we have to stop it," said Homer Glen resident Stephen J. Balich, a Will County Board member.

Watering the lawn, other residents said, is out of the question. One Homer Glen resident on Friday posted to one of the residents' community Facebook pages a picture of her $2,000-plus water bill, the result, she said, of watering new sod.

State Sen. John Curran, R-Downers Grove, said water rates are a top concern among many of his constituents, especially those in Homer Glen. Curran voted against the bill and urged Rauner to veto it so the bill can be reworked with additional consumer protections.

"The difference between what public utility water customers pay and private is alarming in this state, in this area," said Curran, whose district includes Homer Glen.

New rival complicates Rauner run

price while the party leaders, the party elites get fatter at the trough of the people, the people lose their liberty and the opportunity for the American Dream is diminished while the political elite go up the ladder."

A request for comment from the Rauner campaign wasn't returned. But when McCann made his intentions known in April, the governor's camp called him the "worst kind of political opportunist," and the Illinois Republican Party that Rauner heavily subsidizes attacked McCann and called him a "spoiler."

McCann's campaign adds another hurdle to Rauner's re-election bid against Democrat J.B. Pritzker. The new candidate could capitalize on fissures within the state's Republican Party that were on display in March, when Rauner defeated GOP primary challenger state Rep. Jeanne Ives of Wheaton by only 3 percentage points. Ives' bid was motivated by anger from social conservatives over Rauner's signature on laws expanding abortion and immigrant and transgender rights.

Even before McCann filed, the Democratic Governors Association issued a statement contending the third-party challenge means Rauner "will have to keep re-fighting the battles of the primary" because McCann provides Ives' backers with "another opportunity to express their displeasure" with the governor.

And McCann could combine backing from social conservatives and supporters of President Donald Trump, in addition to union members the governor has angered through his so-far unsuccessful efforts to weaken organized labor.

McCann on Monday again criticized Rauner for signing legislation that expanded taxpayer funding of abortion. McCann said it was clear from "day one" that Rauner "wasn't a conservative, wasn't a real Republican. He was looking to buy a party."

"He said he was going to turn the state around, that he needed all the Republicans to be in lockstep with him. Well here we are four years later, we have a tax increase, (and) the only thing he's done is institute a social agenda," McCann said. "I don't even know why the Democrats are running J.B. Pritzker or anybody else, no one has been better for the Chicago Democratic machine than Bruce Rauner."

On taxes, McCann said it should be up to the voters to decide whether to amend the state constitution to allow for a graduated income tax instead of the current flat rate structure — an area of sharp disagreement with Rauner, who contends a graduated tax rate would result in a tax hike for many Illinoisans.

Even so, McCann said he agreed with Rauner that the income tax hike put in place last year should be rolled back. McCann said he believed a reduction could be put in place immediately, saying he will talk about his spending plans in the coming weeks.

In the days leading up to his April announcement, McCann's campaign received $150,000 from the International Union of Operating Engineers. The same union endorsed Pritzker last year less than a month after the billionaire heir to the Hyatt hotel fortune announced his candidacy.

McCann also is hitching his candidacy to Trump, who, despite losing statewide by 17 percentage points to Hillary Clinton, remains solidly popular among Downstate Republicans.

"There's a lot of folks who want President Trump to fail just because he's a Republican, or just because he's Trump, or just because they don't like the way he tweets or some of the things he says," McCann said earlier this month in an interview with WEEK-TV in Peoria.

"I think it's incumbent upon us as Americans to hope that our president succeeds, regardless of his politics, regardless of whether we agree with him or not. You should respect him and hope that he's successful guiding the nation, working with Congress to make a better country and thereby a better world," he said. "So I don't agree with everything that he tweets. I don't agree with how he says every single thing. But I agree with the vast majority of what he's doing."

McCann has faced political controversies in the past involving taxes owed by his construction firms, his military record and his use of campaign money.

He has blamed tax liens on confusion over "various employer identification numbers" used at his firms.

Former political opponents also have taken issue with how he described his military record. He was injured in a construction accident before going to Marine boot camp and said he had been discharged.

McCann also acknowledged last year using campaign funds to buy a $61,000 SUV, as well as an engine for a personally owned Jeep, and spending more than $19,000 for a truck and trailer for parades.

Also filing Monday was Grayson Kash Jackson as the Libertarian Party candidate for governor. If he remains on the ballot, Jackson also will be listed as "formerly known as Benjamin Adam Winderweede until name changed on Aug 29, 2017" — a requirement allowable under state election law.

Previously filing an independent bid for governor was Mary Vann-Metcalf of Chicago, who has fielded bids in the past for president, Congress and Chicago alderman. Vann-Metcalf also filed petitions as an independent to run for state comptroller. Gregg Moore of Broadview also submitted candidacy papers for an independent bid for governor, as did William "Dock" Walls of Chicago, who has run before as a Democrat.

actions or behaviors which suggest that an adult has or had an inappropriately intimate relationship with a child or may be grooming a child," even if the employee does not have "reasonable suspicion" of whether any abuse occurred.

Board members will consider appointing district Inspector General Nicholas Schuler to a new four-year term, have the IG's office take over investigating adult-on-student sexual misconduct allegations from the CPS Law Department and review district sexual misconduct cases dating back to at least 2000.

Schuler — working alongside the school system's top attorney — would also give board members monthly reports about the number of misconduct claims under investigation, some details about the schools and employees involved, the nature of the allegations and the employment status of the involved school worker.

At Goode, which is roughly 5 miles from Simeon's campus, CPS removed an unidentified teacher from campus earlier this month after an allegation of sexual abuse involving a student.

Rodriguez was reassigned pending what CPS described as "an investigation into the school's oversight of staff interactions with students."

Illinois Department of Children and Family Services investigators and CPS are investigating whether the abuse occurred, the district said. A retired principal, David Gilligan, will take over until a new principal is selected by Goode's Local School Council.

At Simeon, CPS officials said they launched an internal review of "management practices designed to keep students safe," which occurred amid a Tribune investigation that documented the school's failure to conduct a mandated criminal background check before making Gerald Gaddy an assistant coach of the boys wrestling and girls track teams starting in 2010.

The Tribune investigation documented broad shortfalls in the district's practices to avoid and respond to sexual misconduct — including ineffective background checks that exposed students to educators with criminal convictions and arrests for sex crimes against children, and the failure of some teachers and principals to immediately alert child welfare investigators when allegations of abuse arose.

CPS officials said the Simeon audit found "systemic issues" in the school's handling of volunteer background checks, while uncovering an unspecified, new allegation of sexual abuse by an unidentified Simeon volunteer.

The recent allegation "was not handled in accordance with CPS policy," according to the district. The volunteer is now barred from the school, and the allegation is under investigation.

CPS said it selected Patricia Woodson, a retired former principal, to lead the school until a new principal is selected by Simeon's Local School Council.

Union Station remodel in motion

The upper floors of the existing structure would be converted into 330 hotel rooms above the train platforms and Great Hall, O'Donnell said. Above that, the addition would house 404 apartments. Bound by Jackson Boulevard and Adams, Canal and Clinton streets, the project will add a new entrance mid-block on Clinton.

Improvements to the main building are expected to include a food hall of 15,000 to 20,000 square feet, O'Donnell said. There will be new ground-floor retail along the exterior of the building and along public thoroughfares in the building.

That plan, designed by Solomon Cordwell Buenz, differs from the initial concept of two 13-story towers atop the existing building but is closer to the addition that was envisioned when the building was completed in 1925. The new design will preserve more of the open middle area of the building that lets in natural light, O'Donnell said.

Amtrak is already in the midst of a $22 million skylight restoration in the Great Hall.

Union Station was envisioned by Daniel Burnham and designed by Graham Anderson Probst & White.

Plans for the main building are part of a potentially three-phase redevelopment expected to later include an office skyscraper just south of the headhouse. A tentatively planned third phase would add an apartment tower built on a platform over train tracks near Union Station.

The developers are looking to combine two separate zoning guidelines into a single agreement, said Jack George, zoning lawyer for the developers.

The first phase is scheduled to begin in the second quarter of 2019, with a projected 2021 completion, O'Donnell said. The planned second phase, an office skyscraper just south of the main building, would require a zoning amendment. The office project, which would be one or two towers with about 1.5 million square feet of space, could begin by the end of 2019, O'Donnell said.

Renderings of the office project, designed by Goettsch Partners, have not been made public.

The exact timing of the second phase depends on when the developers sign one or more office tenants to leases, he said.

Office construction would be on the site of a parking garage south of the main building, which would be demolished. The new structure would have 800 parking spaces, down from 1,700 today. To address congestion around Union Station, the developers plan to add traffic control aides and relocate pickup and drop-off areas for bus lines, among other changes, O'Donnell said.

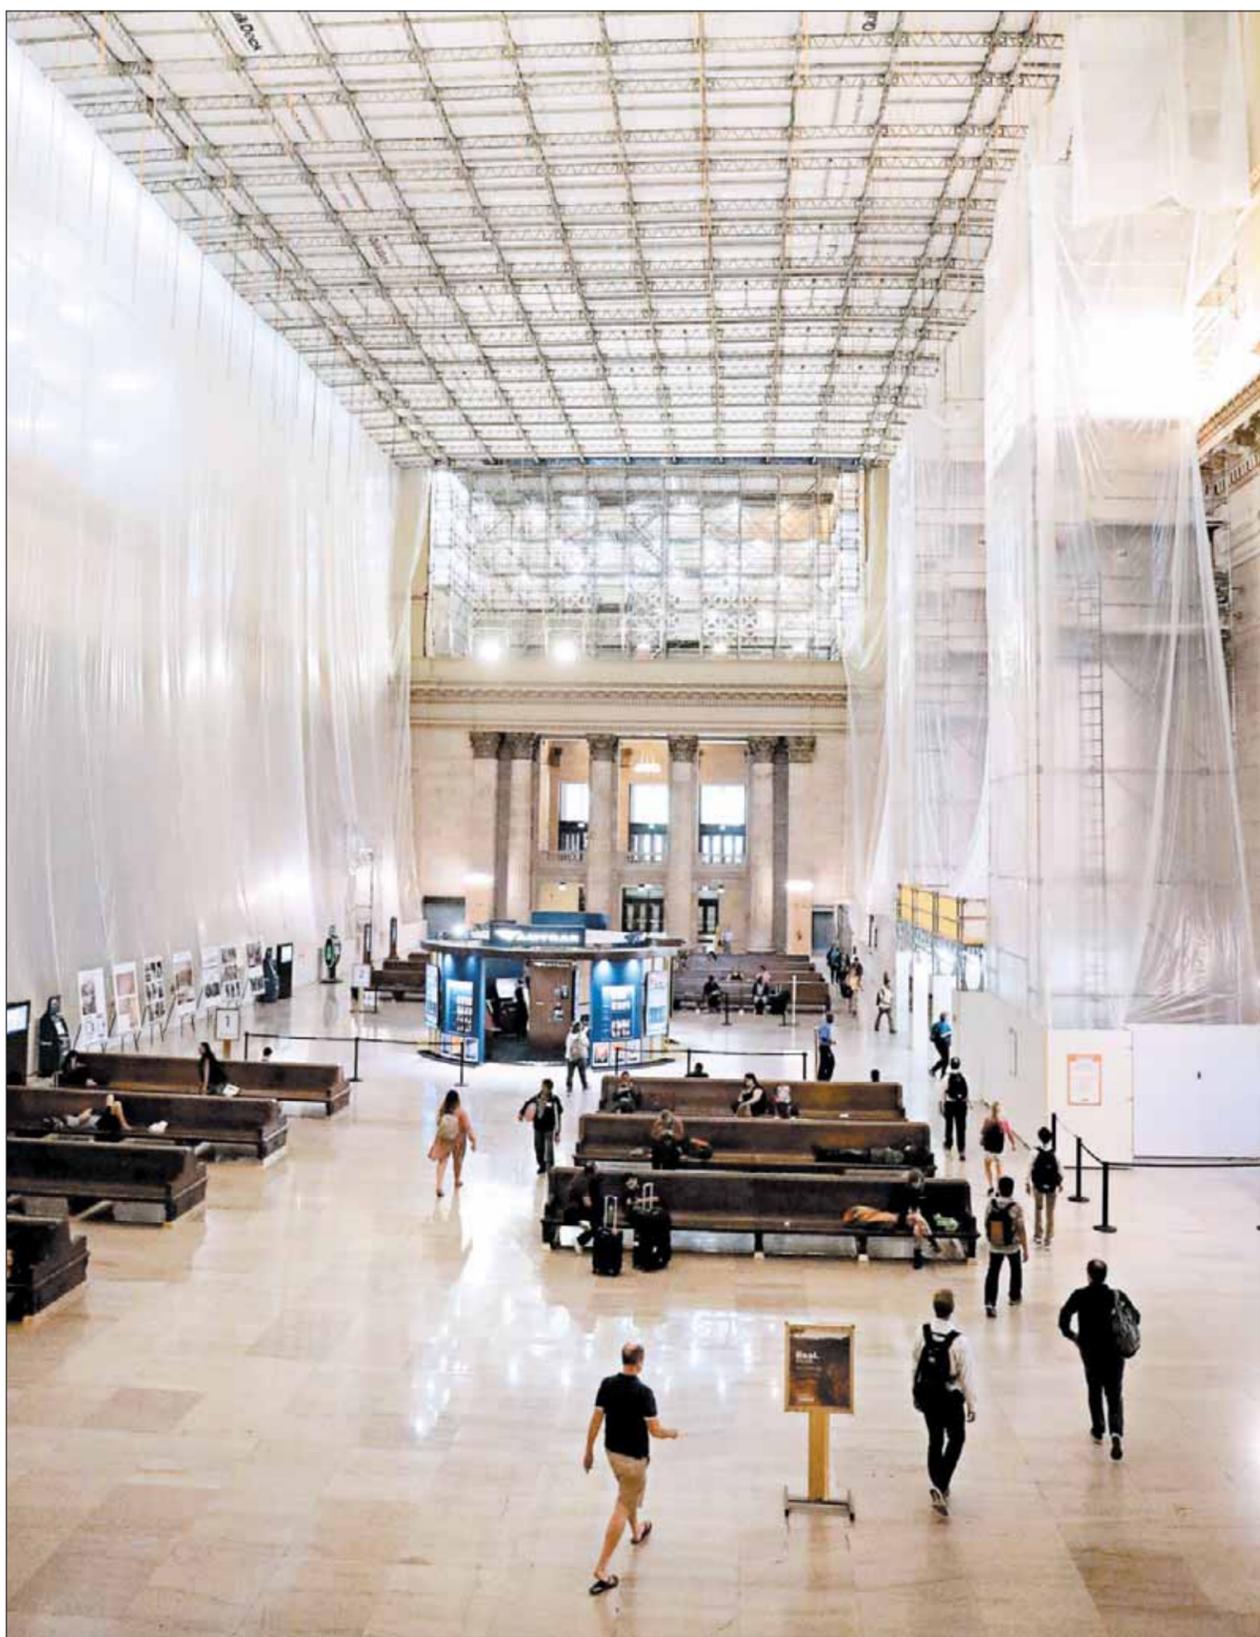

The developers also plan to offer activities seven days a week in the concourse, such as farmers markets and yoga classes. "Part of the plan is to really enhance the overall experience and improve speed getting to the track level," O'Donnell said. "It will create a more positive pedestrian experience."

Previous attempts to redevelop and add on to Union Station have fallen flat. This time around, Riverside and Convexity could benefit from a yearslong development boom downtown, if the economy holds up.

Convexity is real estate development arm of trader Don Wilson's DRW Holdings. Convexity's other projects have included the Esquire Theater retail redevelopment, Lowes Chicago Hotel and the Robey and Viceroy boutique hotels.

Riverside is known for building the trophy office tower at 150 N. Riverside Plaza. Also on the Chicago River, the firm recently demolished the low-slung GGP headquarters building at 110 N. Wacker Drive and began replacing it with an office tower that will be anchored by Bank of America.

The Great Hall in Union Station is undergoing renovations. A redevelopment plan is projected to funnel more traffic through the area.

Union Station proposal on underwhelming track

BLAIR KAMIN
Cityscapes

Daniel Burnham's ghost and his much-quoted exhortation to "make no little plans" haunt the just-released, utterly underwhelming design for a vertical expansion of Chicago's Union Station.

To put things in Burnham-speak, these plans are little — very little.

There's nothing wrong with the idea of putting a 330-room hotel in the upper floors of the station's historic main building, especially if you're a railroad buff in search of an atmospheric spot to stay overnight. The trouble is a planned apartment addition that would plunk a squat modernist box atop the existing structure's neoclassical pedestal. They go together as well as Rauner and Pritzker, the City Council and ethics reform.

The seven-story addition and its 404 rental apartments would bring to the forlorn but grand train station all the grandeur of a Holiday Inn.

The plans, unveiled Monday night at a public meeting hosted by downtown Ald. Brendan Reilly, 42nd, were designed by Chicago architects Solomon Cordwell Buenz for Riverside Investment & Development. Amtrak picked the Chicago developer last year to carry out a $1 billion-plus redevelopment of the station and property around it. Riverside's initial plans, from Chicago architects Goettsch Partners, offered few bold ideas. The new ones aren't much better, though they would make it easier for the public to move through the chronically claustrophobic station.

Such desultory prospects are a far cry from Burnham's legendary 1909 "Plan of Chicago," which envisioned Union Station as a magnificent gateway to the West Loop. The architect died in 1912, leaving his successors at the firm of Graham Anderson Probst & White to design the station, which was completed (sort of) in 1925.

SOLOMON CORDWELL BUENZ

A planned office building atop the station was never built, though foundations for it were laid. The addition would have endowed the truncated station with good proportions and a sense of aesthetic completion. Such was its enduring power that, in 2002, Chicago architect Lucien Lagrange used the design as a takeoff point for a 400-foot office, hotel and residential tower that would have been built atop the station. But that plan, too, fell through.

Solomon Cordwell Buenz has tried a different approach: Not a harmonious replication of the original design, as Lagrange attempted, or a wild, Soldier Field-style addition that offers a violent juxtaposition of past and present. Instead, the firm's John Lahey and Steve Hubbard sought to make the addition compatible with, but differentiated from, the original building. Their decision sounds like a sensible middle course. But it's quite difficult to pull off.

The addition strives for compatibility in a variety of ways. Its recessed base would visually separate the old from the new. Articulated metal columns would continue the upward reach of the station's limestone piers. Sharply defined corners would echo the station's bold, solid corners. A rectangular floor plan, hollow in the middle, would allow sunlight to filter down to the skylight over the station's soaring Great Hall.

The addition's backers tout the fact that it would be only 235 feet tall (245 feet if you count elevator equipment) — far shorter than the approved height for the Lagrange plan. But that very shortness looks to be a weakness, not a strength. The addition would be top-heavy, a ponderous presence rather than a lightweight counterpoint.

Worse, its exterior, a skeletal metal and glass grid, is at odds with the station's carefully composed classical aesthetic. Despite the architects' best efforts, it's as though one era of architecture had been piled, willy-nilly, atop another.

The juxtaposition of past and present isn't as violent as the spaceship-like seating bowl that's plopped atop the classical colonnades of Soldier Field.

It's just banal, which Burnham buildings never are.

There are, to be sure, some good design strokes here. Union Station's exterior has always seemed a bit austere, a bit forbidding, a quality that Solomon Cordwell Buenz would remedy by creating a new entrance in the middle of the station's Clinton Street facade and replacing blocks of stone with light-emitting two-story windows. Comparable canopied entrances — one to the hotel along Adams Street, the other to the apartments along Jackson Boulevard — would make those facades more inviting. Together, the new entrances promise to funnel more traffic through the moribund Great Hall. But the developer isn't identifying retailers that would line the hall and, in a preview of the plans to the Tribune, had nothing new to say about a proposed food hall within the station.

Without fresh attractions, it's going to be hard for the station to become a civic hub on the order of New York's Grand Central Terminal or Washington's Union Station. (And don't get your hopes up if you're a beleaguered Metra commuter wondering whether the project will address the station's Dickensian conditions, including narrow passenger platforms and claustrophobic corridors. Amtrak is handling that nitty-gritty stuff in a separate effort.)

There are other pluses. Riverside is no longer seeking to build a raised outdoor plaza on top of the city's recently completed $41.5 million Union Station Transit Center on the block to the station's south. That would have made a mockery of the transit center's carefully designed, light-emitting glass canopies.

At the same time, a big question mark surrounds the still-to-be-unveiled design of a 1.5 million square foot office building that would replace an Amtrak parking garage on transit center's block. Riverside wants zoning approval for the office building as part of the same development package as the addition to the station.

But its addition design for Union Station does not inspire confidence. A building that's part of the Burnham legacy deserves better, especially when it forms a gateway to Chicago.

Top Democrats: Resist shaming Trump aides

BY SARAH D. WIRE
Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — The recent public shaming of Trump administration officials in restaurants has triggered an internal debate among Democrats over how far they should go in confronting the president and his policies.

The boisterous protests against Homeland Security Secretary Kirstjen Nielsen and Trump adviser Stephen Miller as they dined in different Mexican-themed restaurants, and the ejection of White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders by the owner of a restaurant in Virginia caused some Democrats to embrace the strategy as an effective way to rally supporters and hold officials responsible.

Rep. Maxine Waters, D-Calif., a frequent critic of the administration, gave a high-profile boost to the tactic by saying those in the Trump administration should be repeatedly confronted in their everyday lives.

"If you see anybody from that Cabinet in a restaurant, in a department store, at a gasoline station, you get out and you create a crowd and you push back on them and you tell them they are not welcome anymore, anywhere," Waters said at a rally in Los Angeles on Saturday.

On MSNBC the next day, she doubled down, saying that Americans are fed up. "The people are going to turn on them, they are going to protest, they are going to absolutely harass them," she said.

Rep. Maxine Waters, D-Calif., center, seen last week with Reps. Ted Lieu and Frederica Wilson, has encouraged Democratic voters to confront Trump administration officials.

But on Monday, several Democrats warned that such actions could backfire by eliciting sympathy for Trump officials, rallying Republicans to the polls in midterms or leading to similar protests against liberals by Trump supporters.

President Donald Trump quickly tried to use the protests to portray his administration as a victim, falsely claiming on Twitter that Waters had advocated for his supporters to be harmed.

The Democrats' debate is not unlike the one raging

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., urged caution about protests against Trump aides.

over whether to openly call for the impeachment of Trump, something party leaders like House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California say is not appropriate at this time, especially as Democrats are trying to regain control of the House.

Pelosi urged caution Monday about expanding the protests against Trump Cabinet members beyond official events. Linking to an article about Waters' comments, Pelosi took to Twitter to urge civility.

"Trump's daily lack of civility has provoked responses that are predictable but unacceptable. As we go forward, we must conduct elections in a way that achieves unity from sea to shining sea," she said.

Other high-profile Democrats, like former Obama campaign strategist David Axelrod, called it counterproductive.

"Disgusted with this admin's policies? Organize, donate, volunteer, VOTE! Rousting Cabinet members from restaurants is an empty and, ultimately, counter-productive gesture that won't change a thing," he said in a tweet.

Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer of New York went even further on the Senate floor Monday, saying that copying the president's abusive tactics isn't the answer.

"No one should call for the harassment of political opponents. That's not right. That's not American," he said. "The president's tactics and behavior should never be emulated. It should be repudiated by organized, well informed and passionate advocacy."

Democratic leaders are searching for ways to avoid extinguishing the passionate progressive backlash against Trump, without allowing the outrage to divide or define the entire party.

That was the lesson of the GOP tea party wave, when conservative protesters filled town halls to oppose the 2010 Affordable Care Act. Eventually Republican leaders lost control of the movement, partly clearing a path for Trump's takeover of the party.

Sanders has seemed eager to draw attention to the incident Friday evening when she was pulled aside by a restaurant owner and asked to leave, tweeting about it over the weekend and opening her White House briefing Monday with a statement about the encounter.

Even when asked a question about why Democratic lawmakers haven't been brought to the table to help pass an immigration bill, Sanders found a way to pivot back to Waters.

"They'd rather rant and rave about not allowing members of the Trump administration to step foot in public," Sanders said.

Court signals it's not ready to decide 2 issues

BY DAVID G. SAVAGE
Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — After failing to fully resolve two difficult cases this term, the Supreme Court signaled Monday it was still not ready to decide whether a Christian shop owner can refuse service to a same-sex wedding or when some states have gone too far in gerrymandering their election maps for partisan advantage.

The justices said they would not hear two similar cases in the fall, instead sending them back to lower courts to be reconsidered under the hazy standards they recently issued.

The brief orders, issued without registered dissents, suggest the justices are essentially deadlocked on both issues for now.

The court sent back a pending appeal from a florist in Richland, Wash., who was convicted of violating the state's civil rights law for refusing to provide a floral arrangement for a wedding of two men.

The court's one-line order on Monday said Washington state judges should reconsider the case "in light of Masterpiece Cakeshop v. Colorado."

In that case, the justices, by a 7-2 vote, ruled narrowly for a Colorado baker, but without deciding whether he had a right to refuse service to two men who were getting married. Instead, the court ruled only that the state civil rights commission made comments that reflected a "hostility to religion."

Lawyers for the Alliance Defending Freedom had filed a similar appeal in the Washington state case.

They described Baronelle Stutzman, owner of Arlene's Flowers, as a "floral design artist." She said she had known Robert Ingersoll as a longtime customer and a friend but said she told him she could not help with his wedding "because of my relationship with Jesus Christ."

Lawyers for the state quietly urged her to comply with the state's civil rights law but sued her when she refused. A judge ruled the florist had violated the state law and fined her $1,000.

In her appeal, she urged the Supreme Court to rule that she had a free speech right to refuse to provide "artistic expression" to celebrate a same-sex wedding. She also said that requiring her to provide flowers violated her right to the "free exercise of religion."

Activists speak out recently over the case of a florist who refused to provide services for the wedding of two men.

The same arguments were before the justices in the Colorado case.

Meanwhile, North Carolina Republicans had appealed a federal ruling that struck down the state's congressional districts. The map gave the GOP a lopsided 10-3 margin in its delegation to the House of Representatives.

But rather than decide the appeal, the justices said the lower court should reconsider the case of Rucho v. Common Cause "in light of Gill v. Whitford," the Wisconsin case. Last week, the justices said only that the plaintiffs in Wisconsin did not have standing to seek a state-wide order because they lived in just a few districts.

The high court did decide on Monday a long-running racial gerrymandering case from Texas, ruling 5-4 in favor of its Republican-controlled Legislature.

After the 2010 census showed a big jump in the state's Latino population, the Legislature was accused of drawing electoral maps that did not translate these changes into political power for Latinos.

A three-judge federal court in Texas ruled that the state maps were discriminatory under the Voting Rights Act and must be redrawn. The state agreed and adopted a map that judges in Texas had authorized for use in the 2012 election. The state thought it had resolved the matter.

However, in a second round of litigation, the judges ruled the state had not "cured" its map, and it ordered further changes in state legislative districts.

Texas Gov. Greg Abbott appealed, and the high court ruled for the state Monday in Abbott v. Perez. Justice Samuel Alito said the state Legislature faced a "legal obstacle course" and adopted districts that were accepted by judges there. It was a "fundamental legal error" to brand this as racial discrimination, he said.

Court: Deputy can be sued for shooting, killing teen

BY DAVID G. SAVAGE
Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court on Monday allowed parents to press ahead with a lawsuit against a Sonoma County, Calif., sheriff's deputy who shot and killed their 13-year-old son who was walking on a sidewalk carrying a plastic pellet gun.

The justices without comment or dissent denied the county's appeal seeking immunity for the officer.

The court's decision clears the way for the parents' wrongful-death suit to go before a jury.

In recent years, the high court has repeatedly blocked lawsuits against law enforcement officers for using excessive force, but it refused to do so in the case of Gelhaus v. Lopez.

The shooting of Andy Lopez on an October afternoon on a sidewalk in Santa Rosa sparked protests and rallies five years ago. The 5-foot-3 boy was seen carrying a plastic gun that Deputy Erick Gelhaus, an Iraq war vet, thought might be an AK-47.

He and another deputy were on patrol when they spotted the boy and pulled their car behind him. Gelhaus jumped from the car, crouched behind the door and shouted: "Drop the gun."

As Andy turned toward him, Gelhaus fired eight shots and killed him.

No charges were brought against the deputy, but the boy's parents sued.

Federal law since 1871 has authorized suits against state and local officials who violate someone's constitutional rights. But the Supreme Court has said police have a "qualified immunity" from such claims.

The justices in recent years have expanded the scope of this immunity and said suits may go forward only if the court itself has issued a decision that "squarely governs" the situation that the officer faced.

A federal judge in Oakland refused to grant immunity to Gelhaus, however, and would have allowed a jury to decide whether his use of deadly force was unreasonable. The 9th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld that ruling last year in a 2-1 decision.

Judge Milan Smith said the officer did not appear to face danger or an immediate threat.

"Andy was walking normally ... in broad daylight in a residential neighborhood," and did not display "aggressive behavior," the judge wrote. Moreover, the deputy "deployed deadly force while Andy was on the sidewalk holding a gun that was pointed down at the ground," and "without having warned (him) that such force would be used," he said.

In a pretrial hearing, Gelhaus had testified that the boy's gun was being raised when he fired.

North Korea's annual "anti-U.S. imperialism" rally attracted a reported 100,000 people last year. But Pyongyang has noticeably toned down its anti-Washington rhetoric.

After summit, N. Korea opts to skip anti-U.S. rally

BY CHA SONG HO AND ERIC TALMADGE
Associated Press

PYONGYANG, North Korea — In another sign of detente following the summit between leader Kim Jong Un and President Donald Trump, North Korea has decided to skip one of the most symbolic and politically charged events of its calendar: the annual "anti-U.S. imperialism" rally marking the start of the Korean War.

Fist-pumping, flag-waving and slogan-shouting masses of Pyongyang residents normally assemble each year for the rally to kick off a month of anti-U.S., Korean War-focused events designed to strengthen nationalism and unity. It all culminates on July 27, which

North Korea celebrates as a national holiday called the day of "Victory in the Fatherland Liberation War."

Last year's event was held in Kim Il Sung Square with a reported 100,000 people attending. North Korea even issued special anti-U.S. postage stamps.

Officials had no comment on the decision not to hold the event. But Associated Press staff in the North Korean capital confirmed Monday that it would not be held.

North Korea has noticeably toned down its anti-Washington rhetoric over the past several months to create a more conciliatory atmosphere for the summit and avoid souring attempts by both sides to reduce tensions and increase dialogue.

A 42-minute documentary-style news special was aired on the state television network two days after the summit and has been repeated frequently.

Still, North Korea's handling of the changes and how it presents them to its people remains highly nuanced. So far, it hasn't said much about denuclearization. But it has made significantly fewer references to its need to have nuclear weapons than it was making last year, when Kim was test-launching long-range missiles at a record pace and tensions with Washington neared the boiling point.

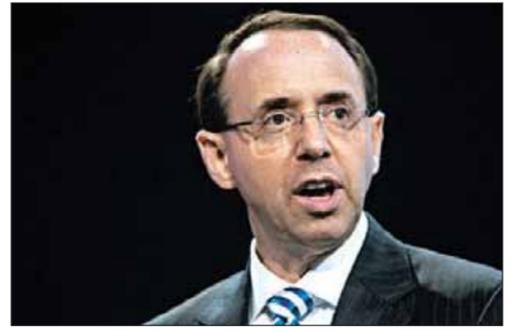

North Korea's decidedly less strident posture underscores the delicate position it finds itself in after decades of touting the United States as its archenemy.

Considering how its relations with Washington could quickly slip back into acrimony if the difficult process of negotiating denuclearization and the lifting of trade sanctions breaks down, it remains unclear how much, or if at all, North Korea intends to recalibrate its other propaganda and indoctrination efforts.

Justice Dept. could face Mueller probe dilemma

BY ERIC TUCKER
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Just over a year after special counsel Robert Mueller began investigating meddling by Russians in the 2016 presidential election, and what the Trump campaign did or didn't do, there remains the question of how much the nation will learn about the investigation's findings.

VICTOR J. BLUE/BLOOMBERG NEWS

Deputy Attorney General Rod Rosenstein will decide what, if anything, from the Russia probe will be made public.

Deputy Attorney General Rod Rosenstein may end up wrestling with a dilemma similar to the one that tripped up fired FBI Director James Comey: how much to reveal about Trump's actions in the event the president is not indicted. Rosenstein, who lambasted Comey for disclosing negative information about Hillary Clinton despite not recommending her for prosecution, may himself have to balance the extraordinary public interest in the investigation against his admonition that investigators should not discuss allegations against people they don't prosecute.

The quandary underscores how there's no easy or obvious end game for the investigation, which last month reached the one-year mark.

Though Mueller is expected to report his findings to Rosenstein, there's no requirement that those conclusions be made public.

And whatever he decides will unfold against the backdrop of a Justice Department inspector general report that reaffirmed department protocol against making public statements about people who aren't charged.

"Those are going to be the hard questions at the end of Mueller's investigation: What is the nature of that report, and which if any parts are provided to Congress and the public," said Georgetown law professor Marty Lederman, a former official in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel. "There's just no way for us to know what if any parts of those reports can be made public or should be made public."

The investigation has hit a critical phase. A forthcoming decision by Trump and his lawyers on whether to sit for an interview with Mueller, who is examining whether the president sought to obstruct justice, could hasten the conclusion of the investigation with regard to the White House. What happens next is unclear, though Mueller has been closely conferring along the way with Rosenstein, the No. 2 Justice Department official who appointed him special counsel.

If he decides a crime was committed, it's theoretically possible he could seek a grand jury indictment, though that outcome is seen as questionable given a Justice Department legal opinion against charging a sitting president. Trump's lawyers say Mueller's team has indicated that it plans to follow that guidance.

Depending on his findings, he also could seek to name Trump as an unindicted co-conspirator in a case against other defendants, an aggressive step taken by the special prosecutor who investigated President Richard Nixon.

The regulations require Mueller to report his findings confidentially to Rosenstein, who would then decide how and whether to share with Congress. Lawmakers and the public would almost certainly demand access to that report, no matter the conclusion; a determination of wrongdoing would presumably be forwarded to Congress to begin impeachment proceedings, while a finding that no crime was committed would be publicly trumpeted by Republicans as vindication of the president.

Spokespersons for Mueller and the Justice Department declined to comment on the options under consideration.

Regardless of the conclusion, the public clamor for a full accounting may make it impossible for Mueller to wind up his investigation with only minimal comment, said Bill Jeffress, attorney for Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who faced charges of leaking a CIA officer's identity in 2003.

"If that conclusion is simply Mueller announcing, 'I've wound up my investigation and haven't indicted anyone else,' nobody's going to be satisfied with that."

U.S.: Border prosecutions halted

has refused to say when — or if — most children who were taken from their parents in recent weeks would be reunited with them.

McAleenan said 538 children who had been taken from their families for short periods but had remained in the custody of the Border Patrol have been reunited with parents.

But the fate of the considerably larger group of children who have been transferred to the custody of the Department of Health and Human Services remains uncertain.

On Saturday, the department said that as of Wednesday, it had 2,053 "separated minors" in its custody. HHS officials and the White House have declined to provide updated figures to members of Congress or the public. Lawyers working with parents to find their children say they have faced a confusing and often unresponsive bureaucracy and no assurance that families will be reunited.

Advocates say that in some cases, parents separated from their children and detained while awaiting a hearing on a claim for asylum are being given a choice: If they want to see their children, they must withdraw their asylum claims and agree to be deported. "They went in and told the parents if you sign this, you can get your kids back," said Jodi Goodwin, an attorney coordinating a "rapid response team" of about 10 volunteer lawyers aiding immigrants at Port Isabel Detention Center in Texas' Rio Grande Valley.

Under U.S. law, people who enter the country and say they fear being persecuted in their home country are entitled to a hearing to determine if their claim is valid. In many cases, immigration judges reject those claims and the migrants are deported, but thousands of asylum claims have been approved.

Trump, in a Twitter message over the weekend, suggested he opposes that process, saying that "when somebody comes in, we must immediately, with no Judges or Court Cases, bring them back from where they came."

On Monday, he repeated that sentiment. "We want a system where, when people come in illegally, they have to go out. And a nice simple system that works," Trump told reporters. Abolishing asylum hearings would require Congress to change the law.

Advocates for the immigrants caught up in the enforcement process have filed at least three lawsuits challenging the administration. A fourth suit has been filed by Democratic state attorneys general.

Regardless of whether an asylum claim is valid, a person who crosses the border illegally can be charged with illegal entry, a misdemeanor. The administration since early May has been insisting on prosecuting all adults who are apprehended. Typically, after a brief stay in jail, they plead guilty and are sentenced to time served. But because minors cannot be sent to an adult jail, the prosecution has served as a reason for removing children from their parents.

Now that the administration says it has reversed that policy and will detain families together while they await asylum hearings, lawyers working with families said many questions remained unanswered. Among them are how many parents had been deported without their children, whether any child has been deported or whether children have been released to family members other than their parents.

Another unanswered question is what will happen when the clock runs out on the administration's legal authority to detain families together. Court rulings have limited the government's authority to hold children in detention facilities to no more than 20 days. Sanders declined to say what the administration planned to do when that 20-day period expired.

"This is a temporary solution," she said. "Hopefully, Congress will pass a law" that would resolve the issue.

The House plans to consider immigration legislation later this week, but Republican leaders have indicated they're uncertain about having the votes to pass anything. Divisions among Republican lawmakers have stymied efforts at legislation, and Trump recently tweeted that Republicans should "stop wasting their time" on the effort.

Democrats oppose the legislation, which would limit legal immigration.

The administration is taking steps to increase its capacity to hold migrants in detention. Pentagon spokeswoman Dana White confirmed that the military has been directed to build tent camps at two bases in Texas to temporarily house migrants. The camps will be built at Ft. Bliss, an Army base in El Paso near the border, and at Goodfellow Air Force Base, which is near San Angelo in central Texas, the officials said.

The facility at Ft. Bliss will be designed to hold families with adults, while Goodfellow will be used to hold children who arrive at the U.S. border without a parent, one official said.

Jerusalem backlash casts shadow over contest

BY TIA GOLDENBERG
Associated Press

JERUSALEM — When the United States recognized Jerusalem as Israel's capital, Israelis hoped other countries would follow suit. Instead, the move has created a backlash.

The latest setback threatens the contested city's hopes of hosting the 2019 Eurovision song contest — an affair that has become something of a national obsession.

The Jerusalem recognition, warmly welcomed by Israel, appears to have triggered a series of unexpected diplomatic fiascos.

Earlier this month, Argentina pulled out of a highly anticipated exhibition soccer match with Israel after the government moved the game to Jerusalem.

Britain's Prince William, who visited this week, listed Jerusalem's Old City as part of the "Occupied Palestinian Territories" on his schedule.

And now, the city's hopes for the beloved Eurovision finale are fading.

"There is a greater concern this year than any other year I can remember about the political backdrop surrounding Eurovision," said William Lee Adams, who runs a popular Eurovision blog. "Many Eurovision fans build their whole year around a trip to Eurovision, and just given the nature of what's going on their ideal has been tarnished."

Israel won Eurovision last month with a flashy pop tune called "Toy" by the previously unknown singer Netta Barzilai, who dazzled viewers with her feminist lyrics, unconventional appearance and signature chicken dance.

Her May 12 victory won Israel the right to host next year's Eurovision contest.

But the celebrations were tempered by continued bloodshed along the Gaza border, as well as the controversial move of the U.S. Embassy to Jerusalem two days later.

More than 120 Palestinians have been killed by Israeli fire since weekly protests began in the Gaza Strip in March. Some 60 people were killed May 14, marking a jarring contrast to the Israeli jubilation over the embassy move and the Eurovision victory.

Israel says it is defending its border against mass infiltrations by Palestinian militants. But the military has come under international criticism because of the large numbers of unarmed people shot by its troops.

Israel is also confronting an international activist group calling for boycotts against the Jewish state. Supporters say it's a way to promote Palestinian rights through nonviolent means, but Israel says the campaign masks a deeper aim of delegitimizing or destroying the country.

The so-called BDS group — for Boycotts, Divestment and Sanctions — has called on the European Broadcasting Union, the contest's sponsor, to boycott the Eurovision contest in Israel next year.

Activists had targeted Barzilai and her song ahead of this year's contest with a campaign calling on voters to award her zero points. But win she did.

The winning country traditionally hosts the contest the following year. But exactly where the show will be held remains an open question.

In Europe, capital cities have usually played host. But the city Israel considers its capital — Jerusalem — is not recognized as such by most of the international community. Just two countries, Guatemala and Paraguay, have followed the U.S. and moved their embassies to Jerusalem.

Hosting the competition in Jerusalem could present a predicament for the public broadcasters that make up the European Broadcasting Union, sparking criticism that they are taking sides in the conflict.

The EBU has taken the unusual step of announcing that it will choose the host city after a bid process. Israel is expected to present four cities as potential hosts, including Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

Israel held the Eurovision contest in Jerusalem following its previous victories, most recently in 1999, without incident. But following the snub by Argentina, Israel is backing off its insistence that the contest take place in the city.

Argentina canceled the much-awaited match just days before it was to be played, after Israel moved it from its original location in Haifa to Jerusalem, triggering angry Palestinian protests and calls for soccer fans to burn T-shirts of superstar Lionel Messi.

Israel said Argentina had canceled because its players received threats from "terrorists."

Israel's outspoken culture and sports minister, Miri Regev, the driving force in moving the soccer match to Jerusalem, has also pushed to bring Eurovision to the holy city.

"The state of Israel has the right to decide where Eurovision will be held. I will recommend to the government and to the prime minister that it won't be right to host Eurovision if it will not be held in Jerusalem," Regev told Kan Bet radio.

Sensing that the Eurovision contest could see the same fate, Israel has taken action to tone down what could be seen as the event's politicization.

After consulting with top aides, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu resolved that the government would not intervene.

Moonwalker sues children, alleging misuse of finances

BY MIKE SCHNEIDER
Associated Press

ORLANDO, Fla. — Apollo 11 moonwalker Buzz Aldrin is suing two of his children and a former business manager, accusing them of misusing his credit cards, transferring money from an account and slandering him by saying he has dementia.

Aldrin's lawsuit, filed earlier this month in a Florida state court, came a week after his children, Andrew and Janice, filed a petition claiming their father was suffering from memory loss, delusions, paranoia and confusion.

They asked for the court to name them his legal guardians, saying Aldrin was associating with new friends who were trying to alienate Aldrin from his family and that he had been spending his assets at "an alarming rate."

Court-appointed mental health experts plan to evaluate Aldrin in Florida on Tuesday and Wednesday.

In April, the 88-year-old Aldrin underwent his own evaluation conducted by a geriatric psychiatrist at UCLA, who said Aldrin scored "superior to normal" for his age on tests.

"I also believe that he is perfectly capable of providing for his physical health needs, food, clothing and shelter, and is substantially able to manage his finances and resist fraud and undue influence," said Dr. James Spar in a letter to Aldrin's attorney.

In Aldrin's lawsuit, the former astronaut asked a judge to remove Andrew Aldrin from control of his financial affairs, social media accounts and several nonprofit and business enterprises. Andrew Aldrin had been a trustee of his father's trust. Buzz Aldrin said in the complaint that despite revoking the power of attorney he had given his son, Andrew Aldrin continued making financial decisions for him.

"Specifically, defendant Andrew Aldrin, as trustee, does not inform plaintiff of pending or future business transactions, removes large sums of monies from plaintiff's accounts, and continues to represent plaintiff in business and social capacities despite plaintiff's repeated requests for such representations to be terminated," the lawsuit said.

Aldrin accused his daughter, Janice, in the lawsuit of not acting in his financial interests and of conspiracy. Also named in the lawsuit are several businesses and foundations run by the family.

Aldrin's oldest son, James, isn't involved.

In a statement, Andrew and Janice Aldrin said they're saddened by the "unjustifiable" lawsuit.

China, EU to form group to modernize global trade rules

BEIJING — China and the European Union agreed Monday to launch a group that will work to update global trade rules to address technology policy, subsidies and other emerging irritants and preserve support for international trade amid U.S. threats of import controls.

Actions such as President Donald Trump's unilateral tariff hikes in a technology dispute with Beijing show World Trade Organization rules need to keep pace with changes in business, said an EU vice president, Jyrki Katainen.

Katainen said Europe was not siding with Beijing in its dispute with Trump but was taking action to protect the global system of regulating free trade. He said the EU wants other governments to join the WTO group.

U.S. officials have said that the WTO requires an overhaul because it is slow to adapt to changing business conditions.

Officials: Retirement home resident shoots, kills firefighter

LONG BEACH, Calif. — A resident of a retirement home in Southern California opened fire on firefighters responding to a report of an explosion in the building, killing a veteran fire captain and wounding a second firefighter and another person, officials said.

Investigators believe the 77-year-old resident set a fire to target first responders. Long Beach Police Chief Robert Luna said that was based on a preliminary investigation conducted after Monday morning's shooting.

The suspect, Thomas Kim, was arrested on suspicion of murder, attempted murder and arson. Police recovered a revolver after arresting Kim.

Fire Capt. Dave Rosa, who had worked for the department for 17 years, died early Monday at a hospital, officials said.

Thai officials believe 12 boys missing in cave are alive

MAE SAI, Thailand — Anguished parents of 12 members of a boys' soccer team missing in a flooded cave in northern Thailand were spending a third night without their children Monday as water continued to rise in the sprawling caverns, forcing rescuers led by elite navy divers to suspend their search.

Officials said pouring rain caused parts of the cave to flood with at least 16 feet of water but that they believe the boys were still alive.

The boys, ages 11 to 15, are believed to have entered the cave in Chiang Rai province with their 25-year-old coach late Saturday afternoon.

The cave is thought to be about 4 to 5 miles long and contain some large chambers. By Monday evening, officials made the call to temporarily pull out.

Syrian troops push south as U.S. condemns truce collapse

BEIRUT — Syria troops advanced against rebels in the south on Monday, in a week-long offensive that has displaced thousands and triggered U.S. condemnation.

The State Department on Monday blamed Russia, a close ally of Syrian President Bashar Assad, for a breakdown of a cease-fire agreement reached last year for the region, which borders Jordan and the Israeli-occupied Golan Heights. Jordan, which is already hosting hundreds of thousands of Syrian refugees, said it refuses to accept any more, as thousands displaced by the latest violence made their way toward the border.

Jordan hosts about 660,000 registered refugees but says the actual number is twice as high.

The pro-state Central Military Media said Syrian troops have seized most of the villages and towns in a rocky area in northeastern Daraa. The government's aim is to reach the border with Jordan, currently in rebel hands.

The Britain-based Syrian Observatory for Human Rights said the government has also been bombing areas in southwestern Daraa, seeking to take back an air base captured by rebels in 2014. The Observatory said the latest violence has reached Daraa, the contested city and provincial capital. At least 29 civilians have been killed and nearly 20,000 displaced over the past week, the Observatory said.

Washington said it was "concerned" about the situation in southern Syria and was communicating with parties on the ground, including Russia. The U.S. has called on Moscow to adhere to a de-escalation agreement for the region reached last year.

Pruitt facing probe of claim he retaliated against staff

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Office of Special Counsel is investigating whether Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Scott Pruitt retaliated against staffers who questioned his spending and management decisions, according to three individuals familiar with the probe.

During Pruitt's tenure, the EPA has reassigned or taken administrative action against several career officials and one political appointee who had objected to the way he was spending taxpayer funds or using the perks of his office, these individuals said.

The Office of Special Counsel, which responds to whistleblower complaints and can prosecute cases, is speaking to a half-dozen current and former employees as part of the case, according to Kevin Chmielewski, a former Pruitt aide.

Thousands were forced to flee their homes Monday as major wildfires encroached on a charred area of northern California. Gov. ### Fight over leak spoils meeting of feds, porn actress

Stormy Daniels' planned meeting with investigators Monday in the federal probe of President Donald Trump's longtime personal attorney was abruptly canceled just hours before it was to start after a finger-pointing spat by prosecutors and the porn star's lawyer over who tipped off the media.

Daniels was supposed to meet with prosecutors from the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan in preparation for a possible grand jury appearance as they work to assemble a case against Trump's longtime personal lawyer, Michael Cohen.

Daniels has said she had sex with Trump in 2006, which Trump has denied. As part of their investigation into Cohen, prosecutors have been examining the $130,000 payment that was made to Daniels as part of a confidentiality agreement days before the 2016 presidential election.

Trump's trade tirade hits Harley and the Midwest

Hogs — as in Harley-Davidson motorcycles — are fleeing the United States, while Wisconsin dairy cows are crossing their legs in anticipation of distress. This is what President Donald Trump's trade war mentality looks like: lots of short-term pain for Midwestern industries.

On Monday, Milwaukee-based Harley said it would shift production of motorcycles for the European market from U.S. to overseas plants to escape the pain of retaliatory tariffs. The European Union raised tariffs on Harleys from 6 percent to 31 percent in response to Trump administration tariffs on foreign steel and aluminum. That would increase the cost of every bike sold in Europe by an average of $2,200.

Wisconsin dairy farmers and cheese-makers, too, are feeling pinched by retaliatory tariffs, these imposed by Mexico as a ripple effect of the steel and aluminum fight. The dairy industry also is vulnerable to attempts by European countries to steal its customers as Trump wages trade battles. The Europeans want to cut deals with dairy-importing nations decreeing that only salty goat's milk cheese exported from Greece can be marketed as "feta," or only hard cheese from Parma, Italy, could be marketed as "Parmesan." Where would that leave the dairy farmers of Wisconsin? With weaker branding, weaker exports and uncomfortable cows. "I could see us getting to the point where we're dumping our milk in the fields," Jeff Schwager, president of Sartori, a Wisconsin cheese producer, told The New York Times.

We'll find out if Trump's tough talk on tariffs is worth the cost in the long run; maybe some nations will cut their customary duties on goods imported from the U.S. Our view is that free and undisrupted trade, not protectionism, is the path to greater prosperity for Americans. The global economy is here to stay, creating an enormous, growing market for U.S. goods. On the flip side, American consumers and businesses benefit from gaining access to the best and least-expensive exports from abroad. It's a classic win-win.

DREW ANGERER/GETTY 2017

President Donald Trump with Harley-Davidson executives. The company said it will shift some production overseas because of tariffs.

But Trump's skeptical. His first impulse is to kill trade agreements, which is what he did with the Trans-Pacific Partnership, an agreement with 11 other countries that Trump abandoned. He's also threatened to leave NAFTA if that agreement isn't renegotiated to his liking. The fight over steel and aluminum is causing the biggest ruckus because it has incited China to threaten retaliation — at potential great cost to Midwest manufacturers and farmers. Trump says he trying to fix unfair trade deals that destroy American jobs, but his attempts to bully foreign countries have invited retribution. China's targets include soybeans, which are grown in Illinois and shipped down the Mississippi for export to Asia.

Trump ran for the presidency claiming he could save existing jobs at U.S. factories. But it was always more a sales pitch than a strategy, exemplified by the fact that he ignored details of the fast-moving, interdependent nature of the global economy. Trump worries a lot about trade deficits with other specific countries, yet such narrowly calibrated statistics don't reflect the overall scope of trade and investment flows. For example, the president has called out foreign automakers for scorn, without acknowledging that companies like BMW and Toyota produce many of their vehicles in the U.S., while Ford and GM have assembly lines in Mexico.

One more point, about an industry we know well: The Trump administration, as we've written, has slapped costly tariffs on Canadian newsprint in order to protect one U.S. paper producer. That decision is costing U.S. newspaper publishers millions of dollars. It's another example of the president's literal-minded take on a dynamic issue. Trade deals should be fair, of course. And, yes, disagreements are inevitable. We hope all these conflicts can be sorted out. But there should be no turning from globalization. The benefits are too great, and the U.S., as the richest, most flexible economy in the world, is in a position to win. Why does the president seem afraid to compete?

The Supreme Court protects privacy from modern technology

In the modern world, people have largely adjusted to the realization that they can't hide. Someone — Google, Apple, Verizon, any number of app makers — knows an enormous amount about them, including where they are almost all the time. Most people don't mind or think the trade-offs are worth it. But it's one thing for your fitness watch to track your location continuously and another for the police to do it. Once your every movement is laid bare to law enforcement agencies, the perpetual surveillance becomes much more threatening.

The Supreme Court, fortunately, is waking up to the unprecedented dangers to privacy posed by the technology of the present and future. On Friday the justices ruled that police must obtain a search warrant to get data from cellphone towers that can be used to track someone's whereabouts. In doing so, the court acknowledged that some of its previous rulings were an unsatisfactory guide to the issues presented in this new environment.

In the case at hand, police got data for Timothy Carpenter, who was suspected of planning and assisting in armed robberies of Radio Shack and T-Mobile stores in the Detroit area. The records documented his location an average of 101 times a day over the course of several months — placing him close to some of the crimes. Convicted on multiple counts, he was sentenced to 116 years in prison.

But by a 5-4 vote, the court overturned the convictions on the ground that the police "invaded Carpenter's reasonable expectation of privacy in the whole of his physical movements." For that reason, it should have gotten a court to issue a search warrant for the information.

The government argued that under the court's precedents, data compiled about a customer by a bank, a phone company or an insurance provider is not private because the individual has already exposed it to the view of a "third party." By that logic, cellphone tower data would be available for police inspection without a warrant. But Chief Justice John Roberts saw the absurdity of applying the doctrine in these circumstances.

"In the first place, cell phones and the services they provide are 'such a pervasive and insistent part of daily life' that carrying one is indispensable to participating in modern society," he wrote for the majority. "In no meaningful sense does the user voluntarily 'assume the risk' of turning over a comprehensive dossier of his physical movements."

Not only can the government now achieve "near perfect surveillance, as if it had attached an ankle monitor to the phone's user," it can "travel back in time to retrace a person's whereabouts" by exploring location data months or even years, noted the court. This "tireless and absolute surveillance" is vastly different from what could be done in the past.

University of Southern California law professor Orin Kerr summarized the verdict this way: "You now have a right not to be monitored too much without a warrant." That mandate protects each person's privacy while enabling law enforcement to get useful information when it can demonstrate a need. And in emergencies, police can act without taking the time to request a warrant.

It isn't clear what the verdict means for other types of surveillance — say, facial recognition technology on video cameras maintained by private businesses or police. Law enforcement access to domestic phone records kept by providers, needed to avert terrorism, would seem to be unaffected because such requests already require the approval of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

This case will not be the last in which the court has to decide how to adapt the guarantees in the Bill of Rights to the unforeseen challenges posed by advanced technology. But the justices have laid down a needed marker.

WHAT OTHERS ARE SAYING

There is an international organization whose members include the repressive regimes of Cuba, Venezuela and China. This organization recently added the Democratic Republic of the Congo, which is obstructing an investigation into the murder within its borders of two United Nations human-rights experts. In the past decade, this organization has passed more resolutions to condemn Israel specifically than to condemn Syria, Iran and North Korea combined.

Most people would not imagine that such an organization would be dedicated to protecting human rights. Yet all of these details describe the misnamed U.N. Human Rights Council. In truth, the council provides cover for governments with awful human-rights records, and it refuses to eliminate its Agenda Item 7, which targets Israel unfairly by mandating that each session include a discussion of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

After more than a year of unsuccessful efforts to fix these fundamental defects, the U.S. delegation announced our withdrawal from the council. Our country will no longer be party to this deeply flawed institution, which harms the cause of human rights more than it helps it.

With tensions climbing between Beijing and Washington over trade, some analysts point to the warmth on display during Kim Jong Un's visit to Beijing as a warning from President Xi Jinping that President Trump's moves on trade could undermine the most ambitious goal — peace with North Korea — on his foreign policy agenda. "I think China is sending a message to Trump: You want to put trade tariffs on us and have our cooperation with North Korea? You can't have both," Bill Richardson, the former U.S. energy secretary, ambassador and repeat U.S. envoy to North Korea, told CNN.

Demonstrators rally Monday outside the Supreme Court in Washington, awaiting a decision in the Illinois union dues case Janus v. AFSCME that could come any day.

How union's demands invited the Janus case

KRISTEN MCQUEARY

It's fitting that Mark Janus, the plaintiff behind a highly anticipated U.S. Supreme Court ruling this week, works for Illinois government. The union he sued is particularly influential in politics and policy here — with perilous outcomes for taxpayers.

The 200-page American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees Council 31 contract exemplifies how the demands of public employee unions have grown extreme in Illinois government and why Janus got fed up.

Overtime costs, seniority rules, a hyperactive grievance process, pay raises and step increases that far outpace the consumer price index, health care plans heavily subsidized by taxpayers, costly pensions and worker protections that keep bad employees on the job have soured the image of public employee unions. They've gone too far.

Several years ago, a supervisor at the Illinois Department of Revenue made the mistake of working extra hours to reduce a backlog of tax returns. AFSCME filed a grievance. Why? She had violated a clause in the union's contract by doing "bargaining unit" work. The union also filed complaints against volunteers at veterans homes who were giving their time, for free, to answer phones and welcome visitors. They were intruding on union workers' turf.

The grievances were upheld through an arbitration process in Illinois that favors unions, not management. Embedded in public employee union psyche, that process codifies inefficiency in government. It's coveted.

And taxpayers are on the hook. The union advocates for tax hikes and government growth — last year's 32 percent income tax hike and now a proposed graduated income tax — to shore up its strength to the detriment of Illinoisans en masse. All those years of unbalanced state budgets and short-changed pension funds? AFSCME, an ally of the Democratic majority, was an enabler.

On the political side, the union is an operative in political campaigns. Its leaders interview and endorse candidates up and down the ballot. They provide staff for petition-gathering and campaign strategy. They dump cash into dozens of races. They coordinate with other unions and political party officials to elect and defeat candidates.

From 2013 to 2017, 74 percent of the union's political contributions went to Democratic committees or organizations, according to the Illinois Policy Institute, a right-leaning think tank. Six percent went toward Republican committees or organizations.

This is why Janus, a child support

ALEX WONG/GETTY

Mark Janus walks outside the U.S. Supreme Court in February. The Illinois state employee objects to paying $45 a month to support his union, AFSCME.

specialist at the Department of Healthcare and Human Services who lives in Springfield, grew increasingly frustrated, along with Gov. Bruce Rauner, who filed the original case. Janus didn't support the union's posture on policy or politics, which are fundamentally intertwined. Yet AFSCME could snatch "fair share" dues from his state paycheck and he couldn't stop it.

If the U.S. Supreme Court rules for Janus, it won't mean public employee unions are dead in Illinois. What it will mean is that union leaders will have to work harder to persuade workers to keep paying. AFSCME will have to prove its worth.

If it does not, employees such as Janus can be let out of union membership and mandatory "fair share" fees. From the beginning, that's all he wanted — to be his own advocate on the job, not a tool of a political organization whose activities he opposed. How many state workers will follow? Beware the stamped.

FAMILY SEPARATION POLICY BY JOE "SOMEBODY DIDN'T GET ENOUGH LOVE AS A CHILD" FOURNIER

ADVISER TO THE PRESIDENT STEPHEN MILLER EXPLAINS

PERSPECTIVE

Koko showed relatable emotion and language, despite controversy over her actual fluency.
THE GORILLA FOUNDATION

Millions continue to mourn a gorilla, and that's a good sign for humanity.

Koko, a western lowland gorilla, died in her sleep at age 46 last week. She started learning a version of American Sign Language adapted for apes when she was a year old, and 45 years later she could comprehend 2,000 words and "speak" 1,000. As the subject of news article after news article and numerous documentaries, she had cemented her place in the zoological zeitgeist. Koko, in short, was a superstar.

Celebrities everywhere court controversy whether they intend to or not, and Koko was no exception. Skeptical scientists questioned how much of Koko's communication actually came from her, and how much came from our own preconceptions and projections. Researchers have argued in the past that apes don't possess the same complex language-processing abilities that humans do. They've also said that humans communicate extemporaneously about the things around them, conversing for conversation's sake alone. Apes, on the other hand, prefer functional language. They use their words when they want something concrete.

WE WANTED TO BELIEVE IN KOKO, SO WE DID

That gap points to emotional differences between us and our simian peers that researchers who spend years raising apes almost as their children are eager to disprove or overcome. And in Koko's case, there were certainly obstacles.

Sometimes, in response to a prompt, Koko would make the wrong sign, or say the word "nipple" with apparent randomness, and her caretaker would call her "silly" before trying again. Other times, the caretaker's questions seemed designed to elicit responses that made it seem as if Koko understood more, or more deeply, than she really did.

Sure, Koko could pair an impressive number of words to objects and phenomena, but when she signed "happy" or "love," did she really feel those things the way we do? We may all have been complicit, critics contend, in interpreting Koko's gestures and signs in way that told us what we yearned to hear.

But, boy, did we want to believe.

When Koko watched a sad movie, her eyes watered.

When Koko's kitten, All Ball, was killed by a car, Koko reacted, her researchers said, with unambiguous anguish — and the footage they released suggested they weren't exaggerating. "Bad, sad, bad," she signed, shoulders hunched. "Frown, cry, frown." She really did seem to be frowning, and she really did seem to be crying. The world was rapt.

When Koko met the late actor Robin Williams, she smiled and they tickled each other. Years later, when he died by suicide, she spent the afternoon sitting somber in her enclosure. Whether Koko actually matched Williams' name to their encounter is far from certain — she may as well have been reacting to the distress of her caretakers — but that did not deter observers, who shared en masse evidence of Koko's grief.

Maybe most important, those who met Koko, from reporters to actors to the late Mr. Rogers, almost all say they felt something.

How much apes really resemble us in their emotional range and mental capacity will probably remain a mystery for longer than many of us will live. But when it comes to Koko, that may not matter. Our response to a creature at once so like us and so different was to seek out the similarities — to experience empathy and to trust that Koko experienced it, too. It didn't matter that she didn't speak English the way we did, or even that she wasn't human the way we were. What mattered was that somewhere in Koko's eyes, we saw ourselves.

A LESSON FOR PRESIDENT TRUMP'S ADVISERS:

How to act with impeccable integrity

BY NEWTON N. MINOW

It is no surprise to learn of yet another Russian contact with Donald Trump's closest advisers in the 2016 presidential campaign, this time with Roger Stone. What is shocking is the way Stone responded to an offer of dirt on Hillary Clinton. Trump's long-time adviser, Stone, had vehemently denied that he had received any Russian communications. It turns out that was not true. In a meeting arranged by an official with the Trump presidential campaign, Stone was offered Russian intelligence on Trump's opponent, Hillary Clinton, for $2 million. He turned it down, not because it would be illegal or morally wrong, but because, Donald Trump "doesn't pay for anything."

This brings the total to at least 11 Trump associates who had Russian contacts during the 2016 campaign or transition period leading up to the inauguration, including one of the president's sons, his son-in-law, and two former aides, Michael Flynn and George Papadopoulos, who now are cooperating with federal investigators.

Election interference by the Russians is nothing new. American intelligence officials have known this for many years. In fact, former Director of National Intelligence James R. Clapper reported this openly in his new book, "Facts and Fears: Hard Truths from a Life in Intelligence." He writes, "The Soviet Union tried to influence every U.S. election during the Cold War." He gives as an example an effort during the 1960 presidential campaign to get Adlai Stevenson, the Democratic candidate against Republican candidate Dwight D. Eisenhower in 1952 and 1956, to run for a third time as the Democratic candidate, "at least partly because he'd made statements against the escalation of nuclear weapon testing and procurement, particularly of hydrogen bombs, and so was seen as 'soft' on the Soviets."

Stevenson's biographer, John Bartlow Martin, provided details of the contact by the Soviets, and of Stevenson's response, based on Stevenson's own detailed documentation of what he described as a "curious conversation" with Mikhail A. Menshikov, then Soviet ambassador to the United States. Menshikov told Stevenson that Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev had "voted for you in his heart in 1956" and "will vote for you in his heart again in 1960."

Stevenson's notes continue with Menshikov's message from Khrushchev: "And you Ambassador Menshikov must ask him which way we could be of assistance to those forces in the United States which favor friendly relations. We don't know how we can help to make relations better and help those to succeed in political life who wish for better relations and more confidence. Could the Soviet press assist Mr. Stevenson's personal success? How? Should the press praise him, and, if so, for what? Should it criticize him, and, if so, for what?" He also noted, however, their desire not "to interfere in an American election," while offering to do exactly that.

Stevenson told Menshikov he was not a candidate. "I said to him that even if I was a candidate

I could not accept the assistance proffered. I believe I made it clear to him that I considered the offer of such assistance highly improper, indiscreet and dangerous to all concerned," and later wrote a letter that in diplomatic terms declined any offer of assistance.

That is a sharp contrast to the email sent by Donald Trump Jr. in response to a Russian offer to provide damaging information about former Secretary of State Clinton. "This is obviously very high level and sensitive information but is part of Russia and its government's support for Mr. Trump," the offer continued. His response: "If it's what you say I love it especially later in the summer."

I worked closely for years with Adlai Stevenson as assistant counsel when he was governor of Illinois, as his presidential campaign staffer, and later law partner. The standard he set of impeccable integrity and statesmanship is one we would do well to strive for today.

The man who did become the Democratic candidate for president in 1960, John F. Kennedy, was elected and appointed Stevenson to be ambassador to the United Nations, where Stevenson famously stood down the Soviet representative on the Cuban missiles. On Oct. 25, 1962, at the U.N. he asked Russian Ambassador Valerian Zorin to confirm that the Russians had secretly placed missiles in Cuba. When Zorin declined to answer, Stevenson said, "I am prepared to wait till hell freezes over — if that is your decision and I'm also prepared to present the evidence in this room." He then presented the evidence that the Russians had lied to the United States, which then led to the end of the Cuban missile crisis.

Newton N. Minow, senior counsel at the law firm Sidley Austin, was chairman of Public Broadcasting Service from 1978 to 1980 and was appointed to presidential commissions and a Defense Department panel for the George H.W. Bush, Clinton and George W. Bush administrations. He also served as an informal adviser to President Barack Obama, who awarded him the Presidential Medal of Freedom.

Restaurants such as the Red Hen, which refused to serve press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders, should tolerate all customers.

Why Sarah Sanders shouldn't have been booted out of that Virginia restaurant

BY KARIN KLEIN

Over the years, but especially in 2008, the year of hateful Proposition 8, I wrote regularly about LGBT rights. I cheered the California Supreme Court decision that opened the door to same-sex marriage. I wrote about the unfair standards to which gay and lesbian couples were being held, about the judgmentalism involved in deciding who was entitled to the basic right to marriage.

Fortunately for me, I'm not a household name and certainly not a household face. But if I were, I would have been stunned and horrified to be turned away from a restaurant where the owner's viewpoints differed from mine.

Should I ever decide to stop by a Chick-fil-A, a chain whose owner has publicly opposed same-sex marriage, it would be monstrous for me to be told (not that such a thing would happen) that I wouldn't be served based on my heated defenses of marriage equality.

He would probably think my beliefs are immoral. I think his beliefs are immoral. But he runs a restaurant, a public accommodation. And as a member of the public, I should be entitled to patronize public accommodations as long as I behave myself, which I generally do, more or less.

That's why I find myself in the strange position of standing up for Sarah Huckabee Sanders, despite her limp attempts as White House spokeswoman to make the Trump administration seem like anything higher than hateful slime that is taking apart our nation's protections and humanity faster than I could have believed possible. Sanders was asked to leave a Virginia restaurant because the employees and owner find her actions fronting for the administration sickening.

And sickening they are. I wouldn't let the woman or her boss into my home. I would gag at the thought of serving her and would hate having her in the same dining room where I'm a customer.

But that's not the same as the general feeling among Trump haters these days after Sanders was asked to leave a Virginia restaurant. The sense seems to be that the restaurant owner took the moral high ground by advising Sanders that she wasn't welcome.

The decision to open a restaurant is a decision to welcome the public. It's the kind of service to which we all should be at least accepted if not warmly welcomed, whether we are gay or Muslim or pro-choice or anti-abortion or even if we are, like Sanders, simply vile, unless we behave in ways that are disruptive to the business. That extends to hotels, retail stores and other public-serving businesses.

We'd be rightly aghast if a restaurant refused service to a same-sex couple. Many people have gleefully invoked the recent U.S. Supreme Court decision about a Colorado cake-maker who refused to design a wedding cake for a gay couple, saying that the right to refuse goes both ways.

But the court's decision wasn't about public accommodation or freedom of expression. Rather, it centered on what justices saw as hostility against religion on the part of the Colorado panel that ruled against the business. That's why two of the court's liberal justices joined the majority to make it a 7-2 decision.

Virginia law does not protect patrons of public accommodations based on their sexual orientation or their political affiliations. (California laws are much more protective.) This isn't about slicing and dicing the laws of different states to figure out who had their civil liberties curtailed.

It's about the kind of nation we are becoming — the kind of nation that, in fact, Sanders and President Donald Trump and various other officials within the administration are encouraging us to become through inhumane policy and hateful comments.

When Sanders wants to buy undergarments, she should be allowed to, even if the owner of the lingerie shop hates everything about her. A gay couple should be able to check into any hotel. The head of Planned Parenthood should be able to order dinner in a restaurant where the owner feels that abortion amounts to the horrific killing of innocent babies.

We may dislike or even revile certain people because of their beliefs or actions, as has been the case throughout their presence. We're big boys and girls. We can handle some discomfort.

In the public spaces of life, there should still be room for us all to sit and have the comfort of a meal or a night's shelter. Let's not allow the extreme and ugly days of Trump to take that, too, away from us.

How's Trump doing? Let's go to the polls

BY JONATHAN BERNSTEIN

We're now more than a week into heavy coverage of President Donald Trump's policy of separating migrant families — but it's already hard to argue that the backlash has dented the president's approval ratings.

As I write this, FiveThirtyEight estimates that Trump enjoys an approval rating of 42.5 percent — a bit higher than in early June, and basically the best since his brief — and historically bad — honeymoon after taking office.

The polling aggregators at RealClearPolitics and HuffPollster tell a similar story. If you cherry-pick the estimate you use (or, even worse, use a single poll instead of polling averages), you might be able to tell a story of dwindling approval. But, looking at all the data, I think it's just as easy to say the story has helped him.

Most likely, neither is the case, at least so far. Trump's job approval probably was helped a bit by the North Korea summit, but, overall, there's been little change in the last six weeks or so. There's a decent chance that the rally in his ratings that began in December has plateaued, but that seems to have happened before the family separation story dominated the news.

Could this be premature? Yes. Polling averages, even sophisticated ones, can be influenced by which organizations happen to release surveys at any particular time. And while good ones do an excellent job of minimizing the effects of surveys that, through blind luck, happen to be far off the real underlying truth, they aren't perfect at it.

Still, if there was a really major effect — say, a sudden 5 percentage point drop in approval — we almost certainly would know by now. If, on the other hand, the effect was small, such as a 1 percentage point loss, then it's possible we're missing a real effect.

Why hasn't the story hurt Trump? We really don't know, and beware anyone who claims to be doing anything more than speculating.

Perhaps the separation story was canceled out by other (perceived) positive stories over the same time frame. Perhaps it's hard for this kind of story to shift opinion very much; Hurricane Katrina's effects on President George W. Bush's approval ratings were probably overstated. It may be that most people just don't evaluate success on these kinds of things.

Even at his post-honeymoon peak, Trump remains unusually unpopular. At this time in a presidency, he's ahead of only Jimmy Carter, according to FiveThirtyEight, although Harry Truman, Gerald Ford, Ronald Reagan and Barack Obama are all within 5 percentage points.

To look at it another way, however, Trump remains dead last in net approval, as has been the case throughout his presidency.

So while it's good news for him that he's moved up in 2018 and hasn't, so far, been hurt badly by the family separation story, there's still very little good news for him overall.

VOICE OF THE PEOPLE

A lonely addiction

In response to the op-ed "Can we talk about alcoholism and Anthony Bourdain?" I lost my brother to the effects of alcoholism in 1998 at the age of 54. He had a fine, brilliant mind, a quick Irish wit, and was an incredibly handsome guy.

He always told me not to smoke as it would stunt my growth. It didn't matter, as I was born to be the short one anyway. He never mentioned not to drink, but then I didn't and still don't. He didn't commit suicide. His demise was like something out of a novel, watching this once strong, good-looking guy demolish himself from drink.

Alcohol is a lonely addiction. It probably started in college in fraternity life, but then, in the '60s, it was a way of life. He had an incredible career, but when things went south so did the drinking.

I wish he were here to share my life these past 20 years. So here's to you, Bill, and as you used to say, "Watch your back, and pick me up a pack of cigarettes."

— Joanne S. Fee, Hazel Crest

Prejudiced perspectives

This letter is in response to the editorial in Sunday's edition "Cigarettes. Drunken Driving. Next Guns?"

The proposal you present in your editorial sounds familiar. Very familiar.

Why? Because it was the same one espoused by Mark Rosenberg, then the director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, when he told Rolling Stone magazine in a 1993 interview that he "envision[s] a long-term campaign, similar to tobacco use and auto safety, to convince Americans that guns are, first and foremost, a public-health menace."

To this end the CDC — and papers like yours — have relied on tailored studies, guided questions and selective data sets to present an incomplete picture of firearm use in America, just as your headlines and editorials focus on criminal firearm use.

So you'll excuse many lawful firearm owner's suspicions — including mine — of the agency's purported neutrality, methodology or intent.

And even though you admit "this is an inexact comparison," such a disclaimer is ludicrous, given that the overwhelming majority of criminal homicides in our community are perpetrated by felons who are already prohibited from possessing so much as a round of ammunition, much less a firearm, but the criminal justice system rushes them back to the street.

Such an attitude ignores the estimated 800 lawful sporting, hunting and self-defense uses that take place each year for every criminal or accidental one. But that doesn't sell papers or push your agenda, does it?

As an investigator in real life, if I were ever quoted as speaking with such a premeditated intent about a case I was investigating, I would be disqualified from the case, no matter how legitimate my findings and determinations were. If a judge spoke about a case in such a fashion, he or she would have to recuse themselves.

But I guess when you blindly agree with the sentiment, researchers and public health officials are just expressing "common sense," regardless of scientific methodology or premeditation.

— Douglas Winston, Waukegan

Either/or

Tribune architecture critic Blair Kamin argues strongly against even considering the demolition of Evanston's Harley Lyman Clarke mansion and returning the grounds to dunes and beachfront.

Recognizing that the building has been empty and deteriorating since 2015, and that full rehabilitation of the mansion will cost in excess of $7 million, Kamin is still optimistic that "an appropriate vision for its future" will eventually materialize. As an example, he offers the old Cook County Hospital, empty since 2003, which will soon become the home of a $135 million hotel and office building.

The unappreciated irony, however, is that many of the people now protesting demolition were previously responsible for killing a proposal to turn the mansion into a boutique hotel (while maintaining public beach access), under the slogan "People Not Profit."

We might wish it otherwise, but historic preservation most often depends on finding viable commercial uses for old buildings. Having observed this process for three years — without any preconceptions — I have come to the reluctant conclusion that we Evanstonians can have either a profit-free lakefront or a preserved mansion. But we cannot have both.

As Obamacare rates rise, Ill. at standstill

Consumers likely won't find out for more than a month where prices are headed

BY LISA SCHENCKER
Chicago Tribune

Illinois residents who buy health insurance on the state's Obamacare exchange are unlikely to find out until later this summer how much more they might pay in 2019, but consumers in some other states are facing double-digit increases.

Premiums are set to increase by an average of 15 percent for silver-level plans in 10 states and the District of Columbia where proposed rates have been publicly released, according to consulting firm Avalere.

Costs will likely go up in all but one of those states, Minnesota, where rates are set to decline by 5 percent for an average silver plan. In Maryland, rates are projected to climb by 53 percent for an average silver plan.

In Illinois, it's unknown whether rates will increase again next year, and, if so, by how much because the state has not released proposed rate changes. Those proposals for plans in Illinois will likely be publicly released on ratereview.healthcare.gov on Aug. 1. The Department of Insurance will release more detailed information about plans and costs in October, once they're finalized.

Open enrollment to buy coverage through the exchange will begin Nov. 1.

Consumer advocacy groups have long requested the state release information sooner.

"A lot of other states make this information available much earlier," said Kathy Waligora, director of health reform initiative at

Easing the squeeze

As crushing student debt keeps young people from saving, employers are stepping up to help

BY ALEXIA ELEJALDE-RUIZ | Chicago Tribune

At 26, Rariety Monford worries far less about saving for retirement than paying down her $60,000 in student loan debt. So her employer has decided to do the saving for her.

Abbott Laboratories on Tuesday is announcing a new perk designed to ease the financial squeeze facing employees like Monford who are burdened with heavy student debt that causes them to forgo critical years of saving.

The medical device-maker said that any U.S. employee who contributes at least 2 percent of his or her salary to paying off student loans will get a 5 percent 401(k) match from Abbott. That's the same percentage given to employees who contribute 2 percent to their 401(k)s. The new benefit will allow people to accumulate savings in their retirement accounts without committing any of their own money.

Helping employees tackle student debt has become an increasingly popular, though still rare, benefit employers are using to attract and retain young talent. More than 60 percent of students who graduate college in Illinois have student debt, with an average bill of nearly $30,000. Meanwhile, two-thirds of Americans ages 21 to 32 have nothing saved for retirement, according to the National Institute on Retirement Security.

Most employers offering student loan repayment assistance make monthly cash payments against an employee's debt to the loan holder. But those payments are taxed, and they don't necessarily result in employees putting more money into retirement savings, said Steve Fussell, executive vice president of human resources at Abbott.

To more directly help young people build a nest egg, "we set about doing this in a way that others weren't doing it," Fussell said.

The north suburban company, which employs 29,000 workers in the U.S., hires 1,000 people under 35 each year. Many of them have master's degrees or doctorates and therefore higher than typical debt. Younger employees with student debt contribute less to their 401(k)s than those without.

Fussell estimates 2,500 to 3,000 of Abbott's current employees will use the benefit, which has no time or contribution limits. Employees who

Trump's trade war threatens newspapers

BY JACKIE SPINNER
Special to the Washington Post

STERLING, Ill. — As a longtime editor of small-town newspapers, Jeff Rogers has seen his industry face the collapse of print advertising, the rise of the internet and more. Today, his 18 employees work in a newsroom here that puts out two daily newspapers for towns just 16 minutes apart, the Daily Gazette in Sterling and the Dixon Telegraph, which started up more than a century and a half ago.

The newspapers, like the staff, are leaner than they were a decade ago, with fewer reporters to write about crime, the school board and youth sports and to craft obituaries for their aging readership.

And now they're facing a new and unexpected threat: President Donald Trump's confrontational trade policies.

Last year, in one of the Trump administration's first actions on trade, the U.S. government imposed tariffs on Canadian lumber. A few months later, it added tariffs on Canadian uncoated ground-wood paper.

The result has been a jump in the cost of newsprint, the second-biggest operating expense after salaries for most newspapers. Rogers and fellow news executives across the country are now bracing for price increases that could exceed 30 percent, forcing tough budget decisions and potentially driving some community papers out of business.

"This may be the thing that pushes us across the line," Rogers said. "We're all kind of close to that edge."

Shaw Media, one of the oldest family-owned newspaper companies in America and the publisher of the Daily Gazette and the Dixon Telegraph, has told some of its more than 150 publications in northern Illinois and Iowa to adhere to strict page counts to reduce costs. The Tampa Bay Times, a regional paper in Florida, is cutting up to 50 jobs because of the soaring paper

Citadel Center to get event space

New York-based Convene will also keep planned space in Willis Tower

Meeting and event space provider Convene has leased a two-level space in the Citadel Center, an office tower undergoing a $100 million-plus upgrade.

Convene has signed a 15-year lease for 50,000 square feet in the 37-story building at 131 S. Dearborn St., the company said. The space previously was a Walgreens store on the ground floor along Adams Street, plus a portion of the second floor.

The deal comes about a year after Convene said it planned to open a 55,000-square-foot space in Chicago's tallest building, 110-story Willis Tower, which is in the midst of a $500 million redevelopment that will expand lower floors to create new retail and entertainment space.

"When we ask our customers where we should be, Chicago always comes up as one of the top destinations," said Ryan Simonetti, CEO and co-founder of Convene. "We're extremely bullish about Chicago, across the platform."

Convene rents out space for companies to hold corporate meetings and events, and it also provides catering, grab-and-go meals and snacks and other hotel-type amenities in office buildings. The company has about 7,000 clients, and about 70 percent of its revenue comes from Fortune 100 corporations, Simonetti said.

Convene, which also manages amenities in some buildings and recently began offering flexible office spaces for companies that have outgrown co-working facilities, plans to continue expanding in Chicago, Simonetti said. The company also has locations in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Los Angeles and Washington, D.C.

New York-based Convene was represented in the lease by brokers Craig Coupe and Matt Carolan of Jones Lang LaSalle. The Citadel Center's owners were represented by Danny Jacobson, Meredith Oliver and Luke Molloy of CBRE.

Convene plans to open in the Citadel Center in the first quarter of 2019, and at Willis Tower in 2020. Its Citadel Center spaces will be large enough for events with as many as 450 people, while the Willis Tower facility will be able to hold events of up to about 800 people.

Convene's growth comes as office tenants place an increased emphasis on the quality of amenities in their buildings. Although the Citadel Center is just 15 year old, owners Angelo Gordon, &

Co., Hines and Dearborn Capital are in the process of adding a rooftop deck, fitness center, lounge and 180-seat conference center, among other upgrades. Construction will be completed by the end of this year.

Abbott said employees who contribute at least 2 percent of salary to paying off student loans will get a 5 percent 401(k) match, the same perk given for 401(k) contributions.

More employers give aid for student debt

join the company with starting annual pay of $70,000 and take advantage of the program could see $54,000 accumulate in their 401(k) accounts over a 10-year period, without any contributions of their own, the company said. That's assuming a 6 percent average annual return and yearly merit pay increases of 3 percent.

Helping employees build future financial security fits into Abbott's other investments to build a sustainable talent pipeline, Fussell said.

"The program does have a cost, but we think the (return on investment) is tremendous," he said.

For Monford, an engineer in Abbott's professional development program, the new benefit will give her much-needed breathing room.

"I have to think about the here and now, and what's most important is paying off my loans," said Monford, who graduated two years ago with a degree in biomedical engineering from North Carolina A&T State University. "But I know that if I don't save, I'm missing out on that time, and time is the most important thing to accumulate savings."

Monford commits 14 percent of her salary — about $800 per month — toward her student loans, plus 2 percent to her 401(k). With the new perk, she plans to redirect the 2 percent to more aggressively pay off her loans or help her get through graduate school — or maybe she'll take a vacation.

"It lifts the burden, and I'm able to pursue what makes me happy," said Monford, who lives in Irving, Texas.

Paige Jones, 24, said she plans to use the new benefit to more quickly pay down the "considerable debt" she has from graduate school at Northwestern University. Jones, who works as a communications management specialist at Abbott, currently puts 5 percent of her salary toward student loans and 2 percent toward her 401(k). The hit to her paycheck has squeezed other parts of her life, such as limiting where she can live and what kind of apartment and car she can afford.

"It really shows that Abbott cares about their employees and the longevity of their employees," said Jones, who lives in Evanston. "I definitely think it makes me more loyal to the company."

The mounting student debt crisis — with outstanding loans nearing $1.5 trillion nationally — has made student loan assistance a sought-after employer benefit.

American Student Assistance, a nonprofit organization, surveyed 500 workers and found that student loan help ranked third in most important benefits, after health insurance and 401(k) and before other perks like professional membership payments and commuter benefits. Nearly 90 percent of respondents said they would stay with an employer for five years if it helped pay off student loans. In another survey, 65 percent of the 827 borrowers polled by student loan marketplace LendEDU said they consider student loan repayment assistance when looking for jobs.

Many employers are expressing interest in offering the perk. Chicago-based outplacement firm Challenger, Gray & Christmas surveyed 100 human resources executives last year and found 72 percent planned to offer student loan assistance, though only 14 percent had plans to implement the benefit soon.

Despite companies' intentions, the perk remains rare. Just 4 percent of employers offer programs that help employees repay student loans, a share that hasn't budged for the last three years, according to the Society for Human Resource Management's annual survey of about 3,500 human resources professionals, released last week.

That doesn't surprise Matt Goines, an account executive at Assurance, a Schaumburg-based insurance and benefits brokerage. About 75 percent of employers want to hear about student loan assistance, but only two of Goines' clients have implemented programs to offer it, he said. That's because many employers are trying to manage rising medical costs without affecting existing benefit levels.

Those that do offer student loan repayment, such as consulting firms and staffing companies, tend to have large populations of young employees with fewer health claims and therefore lower insurance costs, Goines said. He is also seeing social service nonprofits use the perk to combat high turnover.

Most employers offering student loan repayment are large corporations, said Liz Supinski, director of data science at the Society for Human Resource Management. Small organizations may have a harder time affording it without a tax deduction for such loan repayments, she said.

"If some of the pending federal or state legislation, which proposes employer tax deductions or credits for loan repayment, is passed, I think we will see more uptake of this benefit by smaller employers," Supinski said in an email.

Rise Interactive, a Chicago-based digital marketing agency, started offering student loan repayment last year after employee surveys revealed that people didn't like the 401(k) plan. When it dug deeper, the company found that the problem wasn't the plan but that many of its 200 employees — who at the time were an average age of 28 — couldn't afford to participate in it, said Nicole Skaluba, director of employee services.

About a quarter of its employees now participate in the loan help program, which contributes $50 per month directly to their loans. Rise coordinates the payments through Peanut Butter, a Chicago-based tech company that manages the relationships with the loan holders so that Rise can avoid the paperwork and stay out of their employees' private loan information, Skaluba said.

The benefit ties into the company's "holistic" approach to financial wellness and engenders goodwill among employees, she said; when someone pays off their loan, Peanut Butter sends a celebration certificate and Rise recognizes the accomplishment at the company's biweekly all-hands meeting.

It remains to be seen if the benefit reduces turnover among young employees, notorious for moving from job to job.

"In the longer term, I think it will bear better fruit on the retention side and the attraction side," Skaluba said. "If they are considering two different companies, it may tip their decision-making our way as well."

One concern that employers express when considering whether to offer student loan repayment programs is that employees without student loans may feel miffed, said Meera Oliva, chief marketing officer at Gradifi, a Boston-based company that helps employers implement student loan repayment programs. But that hasn't played out, she said.

"Student loan debt is such a huge issue that even people who don't have it feel good working at a company that addresses it," she said.

Gradifi, which launched in early 2016 with professional services giant PwC as its first client, grew to 350 clients by the end of last year, Oliva said.

Employers have wide latitude to set the parameters of their loan help programs. Some offer the perk only to new college graduates or particular departments, and others increase the amount paid over time to entice people to stay, Oliva said. They can decide whether to set monetary caps or pay until students are no longer in debt. Most employers contribute $100 monthly and cap the contribution at $5,000 to $10,000.

Vi, a Chicago-based owner and operator of luxury retirement communities across the country, last month launched a student loan repayment benefit with Gradifi to help with recruitment. It will contribute $5,000 annually per clinical nursing employee, with a lifetime cap of $10,000. About a third of its nearly 3,000 employees are nursing staff.

"Talent is extremely important to us," said Judy Whitcomb, senior vice president of human resources and learning at Vi. The company also is facing demographic pressures. As baby boomers retire, it will both increase demand for its services and reduce its talent pool, as many nurses are over 50.

"We are trying to be ahead of the curve," Whitcomb said. "There is a labor shortage now, and it's going to get worse."

Trade war threatens news industry

costs, which affect every newspaper that publishes in America, including large national publications scorned by Trump.

"This is the biggest issue we've faced in a long time, if ever," said Sam Fisher, president of the Illinois Press Association.

The U.S. Department of Commerce imposed the tariffs in response to a complaint from the North Pacific Paper mill in rural Washington state, which said Canadian paper manufacturers were being subsidized by their government and were therefore able to offer lower prices, giving them an unfair advantage over their U.S. counterparts. The U.S. mill, which was bought in 2016 by New York hedge fund One Rock Capital Partners, is one of five left in the United States.

Under U.S. trade law, the government can impose import tariffs after investigations and rulings by the Commerce Department and the International Trade Commission, an independent, bipartisan federal agency. The Commerce Department investigates and determines whether anti-dumping and countervailing have occurred, which did in this case. (Anti-dumping occurs when goods are sold for less than fair market value, and countervailing is when the goods are subsidized by a foreign government.)

The trade commission determines whether U.S. industry is harmed by the imports. Both the Commerce Department and the ITC found in preliminary investigations that imported uncoated groundwood paper was subsidized by the Canadian government and was then being sold below market value in the United States.

The Commerce Department levied its first tariff of 6.5 percent in January and added an additional 22 percent tariff in March. The ITC, which has five bipartisan members selected by previous administrations, is set to hold a hearing on the issue July 17 and is expected to release its final determination this summer. Both groups must agree to make the tariffs permanent for them to remain.

The American Forest and Paper Association, like most of the paper and publishing industry, is opposed to the tariffs.

"The uncoated groundwood and newsprint market is a North American market," said Donna Harman, the group's chief executive. "Several U.S. producers operate on both sides of the border, creating manufacturing and market efficiencies through cross-border shipments."

David Richey, a spokesman for NORPAC (the North Pacific Paper Co.), said the mill in Longview, Wash., meets almost half the U.S. demand for newsprint and employs 400 full- and part-time workers. Since the tariffs were imposed, the plant has started up an idled paper machine and brought back 50 full-and part-time employees. The plant is now at full capacity, he said, producing 800,000 tons of paper and packaging annually.

JOHN J. KIM/CHICAGO TRIBUNE 2016

Nearly half the newspapers surveyed by the Illinois Press Association had reduced their page counts in early May because of the newsprint tariffs.

"This is in rural southwest Washington, where companies like NORPAC are critical drivers," he said.

Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross has characterized the impact on the newspaper industry as minimal, noting at a Senate budget hearing in May that the tariff would result in a one-cent-per-paper daily increase for The Wall Street Journal and a two-cent-per-paper increase for the Daily News in Longview, Wash. "There is an impact, but I think it's useful to have this perspective what it really means," he said.

David Thornberry, publisher of the Longview Daily News, which has a circulation of about 12,000 on weekdays and 15,000 on Sundays, said the tariff increase will be closer to five cents per copy. Even that might not sound like a lot, he said, but it amounts to at least two reporter positions. (The newsroom has 17 employees.)

"The problem is you have over half your expenses wrapped up in two things," he said. "You can't fix this with cutting office supplies."

The paper has written about the tariffs and the jobs that were added back to the plant. It's been a delicate balance, he said.

"If they win this thing, it's going to hurt them ultimately," Thornberry said. "They can only handle half of the newsprint for the industry."

Uchechukwu Jarrett, an assistant economics professor at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, said tariffs almost always affect more than the product being targeted, which is the case with newsprint.

"This is one company that has a problem with their own revenue stream," he said. "If you're having a rational argument, it would be pluses and minuses. If we do this to save one company, what are the losses? We lose a whole bunch of community newspapers."

Nearly half the newspapers surveyed by the Illinois Press Association had reduced their page counts in early May because of the newsprint tariffs. If the tariffs become permanent, 40 percent of the respondents said they expected to reduce staff, and more than half would not fill open positions. Others planned to reduce publishing days or change the size of their format.

Jeff Egbert, who publishes the Pinckneyville Press and DuQuoin Weekly in southern Illinois, said a 30 percent increase in costs will make it difficult for his papers to do the kind of investigative reporting they are known for: exposing a police coverup involving the mayor's son and uncovering a schools superintendent's mishandling of surplus equipment that led to his resignation.

"We're not going to be able to increase our rates and pass it along because our market can't bear it," Egbert said. "So we're either going to have to reduce the number of newspapers we print, increase our subscription rate or we're going to have to look very hard at our employment situation."

A coalition of newspaper publishers, printers and suppliers is lobbying against permanent tariffs, arguing that newspaper demand is down in the United States because readers — and advertisers — have moved from print to the digital space.

In the Senate, 23 lawmakers from both sides of the aisle have signed on to the Protecting Rational Incentives in Newsprint Trade Act led by Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, that would stop the tariffs until Congress and the administration can review their impact. During a May hearing with the commerce secretary, Collins told Ross that the newsprint tariffs were "harming the industry they were intended to protect."

One of the companies feeling the effect is Paddock Publications, which publishes the Daily Herald, monthly Business Ledger and weekly Reflejos in suburban Chicago and 17 publications in central and southern Illinois. Paddock owns its commercial printing plant and buys paper directly from a Canadian supplier.

Most of the paper rolls arrive by train on the Canadian Pacific Railway. A spur ends at Paddock's plant, which does the printing for the papers Paddock owns and for others in the region.

Scott Stone, chief executive of the Daily Herald Media Group, said the Daily Herald has reduced pages and combined sections to save money. It also is not filling vacant positions.

"Otherwise we'd be having a normal year where we replace people who left the paper," he said.

Other states have seen premiums go up

EverThrive Illinois. "We think information is power and it should be available to folks as early as possible."

But the state has stuck by its guns each year, waiting to release the data.

"Rates have not yet been finalized and releasing premature information could create confusion among Illinois consumers and prompt insurers to revise rates based on initial competitors' rates rather than actuarial analysis," said Department of Insurance Director Jennifer Hammer, in a statement.

Illinois residents buying insurance on the exchange, like consumers in much of the country, have been squeezed in recent years. On average, Illinois insurers increased rates by 16 to 37 percent for the lowest-priced plans on the exchange this year, and in 13 Illinois counties, only one insurer offers plans on the exchange.

The state's largest insurer, Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Illinois, will again offer plans in every county next year, said spokeswoman Colleen Miller. Rates will not be finalized until later this year, she said.

Rate changes will depend partly on how insurers plan to respond to continued uncertainty about Obamacare, experts say.

The tax bill signed by President Donald Trump eliminated Obamacare's requirement that everyone buy insurance or pay a penalty, starting in 2019. Also, the Trump administration has ceased paying federal subsidies, called cost-sharing reduction payments, to insurers.

But a number of insurers, including Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Illinois and Cigna, built uncertainty around those issues into their rates for this year in Illinois. That means it's possible prices may not soar because of those issues.

Other uncertainties, however, have since emerged, including whether the expansion of cheaper association plans and proposed changes to short-term plans will draw healthy people away from the exchanges, compelling insurers to raise prices on those who remain.

"On balance, we're seeing rates going up, and that is because the individuals who are covered under these programs are increasingly challenging populations that are not getting coverage elsewhere, and because there is no compulsion to purchase insurance at this point, the plans are bracing themselves to care for a sicker population," said Dan Mendelson, founder of Avalere.

It's also unclear how many insurers will offer plans on the exchange in Illinois. This year, four insurers sell individual plans, down from 10 in 2016. Some states, however, are seeing more competition on their exchanges next year. Michigan and Virginia's exchanges will likely gain another insurer, and seven states will, on average, have more silver plan options next year, according to Avalere.

Harley to shift some production overseas

Motorcycle maker reacts to the EU's retaliatory tariffs

BY DAVID J. LYNCH AND HEATHER LONG
The Washington Post

Facing higher costs from tariffs, Harley-Davidson said it is shifting production of motorcycles sold to European customers from the United States to another site offshore.

The European Union imposed tariffs on a range of U.S. products in response to similar levies that President Donald Trump put on steel and aluminum from Europe. The EU tariffs will add $2,200 to the cost of an average motorcycle, threatening "an immediate and lasting detrimental impact to its business," the company said Monday in filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

For the rest of this year, the company said the tariffs will add $30 million to $45

CJ GUNTHER/EPA

The EU tariffs will add $2,200 to the cost of an average motorcycle, Harley-Davidson said in a filing with the SEC.

million to its expenses. Rather than pass on those costs to consumers in higher prices, Harley said it would absorb them for now while it begins planning to move production offshore.

The full-year tariff bill could reach $100 million, the company said.

"Increasing international production to alleviate the EU tariff burden is not the company's preference, but represents the only sustainable option to make its motorcycles available to customers in the EU and maintain a viable business in Europe," the company said.

The news sent the company's share price down 6 percent Monday in New York. Harley's decline came amid broader market weakness that saw the Dow Jones industrial average end 328.09 points, or 1.3 percent, lower.

Edward Alden, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, said the decision undermined the president's claim that his "America First" trade stance would benefit manufacturing workers.

"If Trump's trade policies are leading an iconic company like Harley-Davidson to move production out of the United States, then who exactly is benefiting?" Alden said. "This will pose a real challenge to the president's core claim that his policies will lead companies to build more things in the U.S."

Europe represents Harley's No. 2 market, after the United States, with sales last year approaching 40,000 units. Shifting production to its non-U.S. plants will require additional investment overseas and is expected to take nine to 18 months, Harley said.

The move is among the first signs that Trump's use of tariffs, which he has promoted as a way to boost employment in the steel and aluminum industries, is hurting other American businesses. Harley's motorcycles division employs about 5,200 workers. The company provided no details of the number of jobs that would be lost as a result of the production change.

Initial reaction from prominent Republicans on Capitol Hill highlighted unease with the president's tactics.

"This is further proof of the harm from unilateral tariffs," said AshLee Strong, a spokeswoman for House Speaker Paul Ryan of Wisconsin. "The best way to help American workers, consumers and manufacturers is to open new markets for them, not to raise barriers to our own market."

Trump has said that "trade wars are good and easy to win," but users of imported steel and aluminum already are feeling the pain of the administration's policies.

Mid-Continent Nail of Poplar Bluff, Mo., the largest U.S. nail manufacturer, cut 60 jobs on June 15 and plans to lay off an additional 200 workers in a few days, citing plummeting sales following the imposition of Trump's metals tariffs. The company said it may not survive past Labor Day if it doesn't get relief from the tariffs.

"It's not just us. There will be many, many companies that will pay a price for this," said George Skarich, vice president of sales and marketing. "I'm disappointed in Trump. We didn't see this coming."

Disabled make for able workers

U.S. labor shortage pushes firms to tap an overlooked pool

BY DANIELLE PAQUETTE
The Washington Post

Colton Channon needed just 90 minutes each day.

Every morning for about a month, in training designed for him, the high school senior with an intellectual disability practiced making steel brackets for trucks at a Des Moines, Iowa, factory. The skill took more than a few tries to master. But his co-workers, he said, cheered him on.

A supervisor stayed close, showing him how to pack the parts neatly into boxes that would ship to Ford, Honda and General Motors. And the effort produced something the 20-year-old once deemed distant: a job offer he could see turning into a career.

As the nation's unemployment rate nears the lowest point in 50 years, sinking in May to 3.8 percent, companies are searching more widely to fill vacancies. Advocates say the labor shortage, coupled with growing openness to workers with mental and physical limitations, has brought record numbers of people with disabilities into the workforce — and it has also pushed employers to adopt more inclusive practices to support the new hires, such as longer and more hands-on training.

Over the past year, the jobless rate for workers with disabilities has fallen at a faster rate than among the general population, dropping 2.7 percentage points, from 9.5 percent to 7 percent.

At the same time, the share of working-age people with disabilities in the U.S. who are employed — a historically low figure — hit 29.7 percent last month, up 1.7 percent from a year ago, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

"Firms are more likely

CALLA KESSLER/FOR THE WASHINGTON POST

Colton Channon, left, was hired by Dee Zee Manufacturing, an Iowa firm that makes truck and SUV accessories.

now to reach out in places they've never reached out before," said Andrew Houtenville, research director of the Institute on Disability at the University of New Hampshire. "They're also customizing jobs for people who might have previously been left out of the labor market."

In Channon's case, Dee Zee Manufacturing, a truck and SUV accessory-maker, offered tailored training during school hours and held a job for him after graduation in May, paying $10 an hour. (Channon said he requested a part-time role until he gets used to the work.)

Channon, who reads at a seventh-grade level and took five years to complete high school, had worried he would have to settle for a job like his first one, which he dreaded: washing dishes at a grocery store.

"I've worn a Dee Zee shirt every single day since I started," Channon said. "I love being part of it."

Jackie Harvey, a production manager at Dee Zee, said the average hire starts on the assembly line with written instructions for the part they're expected to make. A co-worker "buddy" is assigned to answer their questions for a week.

Channon required a little more investment.

"You've got to go a little slower," said Harvey, who oversaw his training. "You've got to explain things a bit more thoroughly to make sure he understands why it is the way it is: You put this clip on this brace because it mounts onto the truck, and then the screw goes up through there."

Dee Zee officials said the arrangement was partly motivated by Iowa's worker drought and partly by its desire to attract workers who will stay with the company.

At 2.3 percent, the unemployment rate in greater Des Moines is below the national average of 3.8 percent. Dee Zee faces tough competition for workers from other plants.

"We do have to think outside the box," said Corbin Kinney, a talent acquisition consultant at Dee Zee.

The National Organization on Disability, which tracks hiring trends, said that 62 percent of employers in its 2018 survey of 200 companies had adopted "leading practices" in training and technology for staffers with disabilities, up from 57 percent in 2016. Firms are partnering with local organizations that support people with disabilities, drafting policies on recruiting such individuals and hiring senior leaders to monitor their retention.

The moves toward a more inclusive workplace have also given momentum to the push to outlaw the practice of paying disabled employees below federal minimum wages in sheltered workplaces.

Over the past four years, Alaska, Maryland, Vermont and New Hampshire have banned employers from paying workers with disabilities below the minimum wage. New York has proposed a similar measure.

Meanwhile, some companies are discovering the benefits of a more inclusive workplace, said Michelle Krefftt, a director at Iowa Vocational Rehabilitation, a state agency that connects disabled workers to jobs.

Ernst & Young, the global consultancy firm, recently swapped out traditional job interviews for hands-on auditions for candidates with developmental disorders, said Hiren Shukla, EY's neurodiversity program leader.

"We don't want to get hung up on 'Did you make eye contact?'" he said.

Over the past two years, the firm has hired 14 people with autism as account-support associates. EY hopes to add six more.

"We think we have hit upon an untapped workforce," Shukla said.

One is James Hudgins, 33, who works in the firm's Dallas office. He was selling car parts before a state workforce development agency put him in touch with EY last year.

The company trained him, and Hudgins quickly picked up coding. He soon found a way to automate progress reports.

"That's my pride and joy right there," he said.

Krefftt said businesses have a financial stake in making accommodations.

She said more manufacturers are offering job shares, allowing workers to split one full-time role. (That can be ideal for workers with physical limitations who have trouble working eight-hour shifts, she said.)

Meanwhile, Janet Bruckshen, executive director of Washington Vocational Services near Seattle, said she has noticed more tab-lets in use that help deaf workers communicate.

Some employers, though, still hesitate to hire people who rely on screens.

"We still get comments like: 'We can't do it. Workers need to communicate with customers,'" Bruckshen said. "But all it takes is saying, 'Wait a sec. What if we figure out an accommodation?'"

Lurie again ranked among top children's hospitals

BY LISA SCHENCKER

Lurie Children's Hospital has again been ranked among the top 10 children's hospitals in the nation, according to U.S. News & World Report.

The publication named Lurie 10th in the nation, down from its ranking of seventh last year.

The hospital has been on U.S. News' Best Children's Hospitals Honor Roll for seven consecutive years, Lurie noted in a statement. Hospitals were ranked based on patient outcomes, including mortality and infection rates, clinical resources and compliance with best practices.

NANCY STONE/CHICAGO TRIBUNE 2012

Lurie Children's Hospital has been on U.S. News' Best Children's Hospitals Honor Roll for seven consecutive years.

Lurie has been expanding as a number of other area hospitals have cut their pediatric inpatient programs. In the past 10 months, Lurie was unable to accept more than 50 transfers from other hospitals because of a lack of space, the hospital said.

Last year, the state approved a request by Lurie to add 48 beds — 44 intensive care beds and four neonatal intensive care beds — at a cost of $51 million. As part of that, the hospital opened the Regenstein Cardiac Care Unit this month. The hospital also plans to add 24 beds for cancer and blood disorders in 2019. Lurie served more than 208,000 children from 50 states and 58 countries last year.

Skip the soup.

While it's no secret that Kraft Heinz investors have been urging the ketchup giant to look at deals as a way to bolster its languishing stock price, Campbell Soup shouldn't look appetizing, according to analysts. This comes after a June 22 New York Post article said the ketchup giant was eyeing the soup company in a possible transaction.

While a Kraft Heinz acquisition of Campbell Soup may add to its bottom line, analysts say, the soup maker lacks international appeal and has its own deal integration issues to contend with after its acquisition of Snyder's-Lance.

Even if a deal could provide approximately 10 percent accretion to Kraft Heinz, which is headquartered in Chicago and Pittsburgh, Campbell "does not provide international routes to market," Wells Fargo analyst John Baumgartner writes in a note. In addition, the retailers' prioritization of private label, in a category that isn't showing growth, may pressure Campbell's "hallowed" soup margins, he says. In a deal, Baumgartner estimates synergies topping out at 8 percent of Campbell's revenue.

The bottom line is that Wells Fargo doesn't see Campbell "structurally improving" Kraft Heinz's business. Kraft could even face multiple contraction.

JPMorgan analyst Ken Goldman views it differently. He sees a potentially strong profit accretion of at least 20 percent with the use of Campbell as a "stepping stone" to a larger deal in the future. He also pointed out that 3G has historically coveted strong brands, and the iconic Campbell Soup label transcends mere food packaging thanks to Andy Warhol.

There is some agreement between the analysts, as Goldman says Campbell doesn't appear to fit Kraft's desire to buy "growth-type assets that can expand internationally." Furthermore, Campbell is "highly exposed" to direct store delivery, which in Goldman's view is less valuable than it used to be.

OBITUARIES

DR. PAULA JAUDES 1946-2018

U. of C. professor was president of La Rabida

BY BOB GOLDSBOROUGH
Chicago Tribune

As president and CEO of La Rabida Children's Hospital from 1996 until 2011 and also as the longtime medical director at the Illinois Department of Children and Family Services, Paula Kienberger Jaudes devoted her career to providing medical care for children with lifelong disabilities or who were in foster care.

"Paula was a life force and left a major imprint on La Rabida Children's Hospital and even more so on the children she cared and advocated for, as well as their families," said Brenda Wolf, La Rabida's president and CEO.

Jaudes, 71, died of complications from ovarian cancer June 16 at her home, said her sister, Peggy Oglesby. Jaudes had been a Near West Side resident.

Born Paula Kienberger in Panama to a doctor father who was serving in the Army there, Jaudes grew up in Independence, Mo., and graduated from Notre Dame de Sion School in Kansas City, Mo. She received a bachelor's degree in biology from Creighton University in 1968, followed by a master's degree in physiology from the University of California at Berkeley.

Jaudes then decided to pursue a career in medicine and spent two years at the University of Missouri School of Medicine before moving with her husband to Chicago and finishing medical school in 1975 at Rush Medical College.

Jaudes worked for her entire professional career in the University of Chicago's Department of Pediatrics, where she rose to become a professor of pediatrics. She served a pediatric residency from 1975 until 1978 at the U. of C.'s Wyley Children's Hospital, followed by a fellowship in pediatric ambulatory care from 1978 until 1979.

After completing her residency, Jaudes joined the U. of C.'s medical staff permanently, seeing patients and also doing research. She became an assistant professor in 1980, an associate professor in 1987 and a professor of clinical pediatrics in 1997. She then was promoted to professor of pediatrics in 2003.

In 1993, Jaudes took on added responsibilities as the first medical director for the Illinois DCFS. In the part-time contract post, which she held until her death, Jaudes was the first physician in the U.S. to be named medical director of a state welfare agency.

Paula Jaudes was a long-time child welfare advocate and worked with DCFS.

Jaudes used her work for DCFS to improve health care for children in Illinois' foster care system. That included developing a protocol for wellness exams for children in foster care and giving foster children an electronic medical passport that kept their health care records available as they aged through the foster care system.

"People who worked with her adored her. She somehow managed to be both insistent and charming at the same time," said Neil Skene, special assistant to the director of the state DCFS. "She would say we needed to do something, and then she would just do it. I remember one day she was showing data that kids have better health care when they leave foster care than when they arrived. She was very proud of that, because she viewed every kid as her responsibility."

Jaudes also had a long-time relationship with La Rabida Children's Hospital, which is in the South Side's Woodlawn neighborhood, not far from the U. of C. Almost 40 years ago, she was the co-medical director of a "Homeward Bound" unit at La Rabida that was aimed at stabilizing and transitioning children who were in intensive care units and on ventilators, eventually to be brought home. The program included training parents how to care for their children at home, Wolf said.

"At the time, (that was) a very unique and forward-thinking model of care," Wolf said.

In 1996, Jaudes took on a larger role at La Rabida, as its president and CEO. Over the next 15 years, she "established the care model of providing a patient-centered medical home for children with special health care needs, offering primary and specialty care as well as care coordination for these children with complex needs," Wolf said.

Jaudes' work at La Rab-ida led the nonprofit National Committee on Quality Assurance, an accreditation organization, to recognize the hospital as a "medical home."

"Paula's ultimate goal was always to make sure that the kids served by La Rabida received the care and services that they needed and deserved," Wolf said.

Jaudes stepped down from La Rabida in 2011. However, she continued working both at the U. of C. and in what was intended to be a one-day-a-week capacity as medical director for the state DCFS.

"She went all-out in that (role at DCFS), as in everything she did, and turned one day into five, taking phone calls and conferences whenever they might occur," said Nancy Frankenberry, a close friend. "She had fantastic energy almost to the end of her life. She could have run five hospitals at once, and balanced it all with a sense of fun and laughter."

Jaudes also sought national influence over policy initiatives on foster care. Since 2005 she had served on the executive committee of the American Academy of Pediatrics Council on Foster Care, Adoption and Kinship Care.

At the global level, Jaudes served as the associate director of outreach at the U. of C.'s Center for Global Health. Her interest in improving children's health around the world spurred a visit in 2011 and 2012 to Nigeria's University of Ibadan, where she developed an educational protocol for parents of children with sickle cell anemia. That work included informational materials widely distributed by doctors in Nigeria.

Friends and family said that although Jaudes never had children of her own, she often said that every child she served in her career was hers.

"She said, 'I have thousands and thousands of kids in the program and in the state,'" her sister said.

Jaudes never retired. She had been treated for cancer for the past 3½ years before entering hospice care, Frankenberry said.

Jaudes' husband, Paul, died at 40 of complications from a brain tumor. Apart from her sister, Jaudes is survived by two nieces, a nephew and eight grandnieces and grandnephews.

No public memorial service is planned, in accordance with Jaudes' wishes.

ON JUNE 26 ...

In 1948 the Berlin airlift began in earnest as U.S., British and French planes started ferrying food and supplies to the isolated western sector of Berlin after Moscow had cut off land and water routes.

In 1959 President Dwight Eisenhower joined Queen Elizabeth II in ceremonies opening the St. Lawrence Seaway.

In 1963 President John F. Kennedy visited West Berlin, where he declared:

"Ich bin ein Berliner" (I am a Berliner).

In 1968 Chief Justice Earl Warren announced his intention to resign from the U.S. Supreme Court.

In 1990 President George H.W. Bush, who had campaigned for office on a pledge of "no new taxes," conceded that tax increases would have to be included in any deficit-reduction package.

In 1997 J.K. Rowling's book "Harry Potter and Philosopher's Stone" was released in Britain. It would later be released as "Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone" in the U.S.

In 2000 rival scientific teams completed the first rough map of the human genetic code.

In 2003 the Supreme Court struck down sodomy laws in 13 states; the majority opinion said gays and lesbians were "entitled to respect for their private lives."

In 2008 the Supreme Court struck down a handgun ban in the District of Columbia as it affirmed, 5-4, that an individual right to gun ownership existed.

In 2013 the Supreme Court, in two 5-4 votes, struck down part of the federal Defense of Marriage Act and threw out an appeal related to California's Proposition 8, taking a major step toward legalizing same-sex marriage nationwide.

In 2014 the Supreme Court, in a 9-0 vote, struck down a 2007 Massachusetts law that mandates a 35-foot buffer zone around abortion clinics to allow patients unimpeded access.

Miller, Lee R

Lee Miller (nee Lolita Mae Heavey) born on October 1, 1922, passed peacefully in the early morning of June 22, 2018; under hospice care at Hinsdale Hospital. She was preceded in death by her husband, Robert G. Miller to whom she was married for 44 years. Also deceased are her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Heavey; her brother, Jack Heavey; sister Betty and brother-in-law, Bertram Temple; and her twin sister, LaVerne Heavey Peters, and husband, Calvin Peters. She will be greatly missed by her children: Jeanine M. Gendreau, now residing in Darien, IL; and Roger A. Miller, of Denver, Colorado. She also leaves behind a grandson, Dr. Robert A. Gendreau of Hartford, CT; granddaughter, Whitney Lee Gendreau Jackson residing in Norman, OK. with her husband, Jack and Lee's only great-grandchild, Owen Robert Kenison. She enjoyed a close relationship with her sister-in-law, Stephanie, Mrs. Jack Heavey, and her daughter, Tricia. Her longest and dearest friend of over seventy-five years, Sylvia Malicki of Darien, remembers working together during the World War II years; and the fun, travel, and great times they spent together until just recently. Lee was an active and adventuresome person; enjoying such hobbies as swimming and water skiing at the family summer home in Wisconsin. She played tennis and enjoyed snow skiing up to the age of 90, at her condo in Snowbird, UT. A world-traveler, she was always ready for the next trip to Europe, or a cruise to somewhere warm during the Chicago winters. She enjoyed playing card games and was a member of several social/card groups. After moving to Hinsdale in 1958, she worked at the local Tribune office-Merrill Printing, which published The Doings in the 1960's. Lee was a life-long Catholic and a very active and devoted member of St. Isaac Jogues Catholic Church, Hinsdale, IL. Lee formed many church friendships over the past sixty years. She joined various groups: playing bridge, golfing on Wednesdays, washing and ironing church linens for many years. She was on the committee for the last architectural renovation project and was responsible for organizing the parish photo/address directory for the 75th-anniversary edition in 2005. A lifelong devotion to the Blessed Mother, Lee was a long-standing member of the daily rosary group-- always present, and rarely missed the following 5:00 pm daily mass. Her volunteering extended to her surrounding community. She assisted along with Mr. & Mrs. Sherry at the Hinsdale town hall, mailing out public notices such as dog and cat license renewals. She also volunteered her time at Mays Lake, helping out with the mailings, and volunteered as a classroom assistant in the late 1990's. Her job was to teach classroom skills to handicapped elementary students. Lee was always eager to help but, was electronically challenged. She liked to recount that her time trying to teach computer skills, ended up with the students teaching her how to deal with computers. A learning experience absorbed with her usual grace and dignity. For the past five years, Lee waited patiently, bearing her Alzheimer's disease with a contented smile. She was a prayerful, kind and loving woman, with complete faith and trust in her Lord...we feel that she is now a welcome addition to heaven's assembly. A funeral mass will be held at St. Isaac Jogues Catholic Church, 306 W. 4th Street, Hinsdale, IL on Friday, June 29th, at 10:00 am. Friends may gather with the family in the Fireplace Room, at 9:00 am, prior to the mass where a final rosary will be said. Interment will follow at Queen of Heaven Cemetery in Hillside. Following interment, a luncheon gathering will be held at The Clubhouse, Oakbrook Center. Memorials appreciated to the Society of the Little Flower, 1313 N. Frontage Road, Darien, IL 60561 or www.littleflower.org. Arrangements by Brian Powell Funeral Directors of Hinsdale. ## Thornburg, Marie Dora "Doe"

Marie Dora "Doe" Thornburg died peacefully on May 25, 2018. Doe Thornburg (née Wettlaufer) was born in Boston on August 2, 1922, the eldest of eight siblings, all of whom preceded her in death. Doe attended Boston's Northeastern University, Chandler Business School, and Malkin Conservatory where she studied voice and piano. Her upbringing was greatly influenced by her paternal grandmother who, on numerous occasions, took her to Europe to complete her education in the fashion of the Grand Tour. As World War II was beginning, Doe joined the Red Cross as one of its spokespersons and organizers.

After Doe came to Chicago, she served on the Boards of the Lyric Opera Guild, Hull House, the Museum of Contemporary Art (Women's Board), the American Cancer Society, International House, the International Visitors Center, and the Chicago Tourism Council, as well as on committees of Chicago Seminars on the Future and Know Your Chicago.

For a number of years, Doe was National President of the English-Speaking Union. For her untiring efforts on behalf of this organization in improving the relations between Great Britain and the United States, she was honored by Queen Elizabeth II as a "motivator of people" and was made an officer in the Order of the British Empire (O.B.E.).

In 1978, while working with The International Visitors Center of Chicago, Doe recognized the need for a separate organization focusing exclusively on women from different international cultures and backgrounds living in Chicago and founded the International Women Associates (IWA). Its mission was "to promote understanding and cooperation among Chicago-area women of all nations."

Of all Doe's many contributions, International Women Associates was her proudest. Her vision was one of world unity in the face of cultural, political and social conflict. She believed that bringing women of diverse backgrounds together created opportunities for understanding and appreciating what makes us world citizens. At the time of her death, IWA membership had grown to over 500 women from 60 countries. Through participation in language, culture, and activity programs, as well as in larger public meetings, IWA members' horizons are broadened, consciousness lifted, and friendships diversified. Its quest to put global understanding into action is inspired by Doe's mantra, "to see the sacred in everyone."

IWA honored Doe in 2012 on the occasion of her 90th birthday by creating the IWA Doe Thornburg Scholarship. The purpose of the scholarship is to invest in students so that they become engaged global citizens. Doe believed that there is no better way to understand a different culture than to have direct interaction with that culture. For this reason, the scholarship was created to help female college students pursue their dream of studying abroad. To date, the IWA Doe Thornburg Scholarship is offered at Columbia College, Northwestern University, School of the Art Institute and University of Illinois at Chicago.

In 1972 Doe married Robert Thornburg, owner and director of Thornburg Clinical Laboratory, who died in 1997. In "Bob" she met her soul mate.

Doe was "one in a million," a truly remarkable individual in spirit and physicality right up until the end. She had a beautiful smile, exuded an elegant sense of style and lived an engaged, purposeful life.

She is survived by seven nieces and nephews: Catherine Wettlaufer Buehler (Jay), Robert Alan Doonan (Becky), Suzanne Marie Doonan, Andrew David Doonan (Sherron), William Lyons Doonan, Rear Admiral Michael Wettlaufer (Tina), and Professor John S. Wettlaufer (Ulrika) and their children, as well as by her cousins. She is also survived by step-daughter Carol Kathleen Thornburg.

In lieu of flowers, contributions may be made to the IWA Doe Thornburg Scholarship Fund, in care of International Women Associates, 307 N Michigan Avenue, Suite 702, Chicago, IL 60601, 312-263-1421 or online at www.iwachicago.org.

Expect up, down season to continue

Roller-coaster ride not likely to end as Cubs pursue another title

The Cubs could win the World Series this year, and you will look back on the lost weekend in Cincinnati and laugh.

Or they might miss the post-season altogether, in which case you will look back on the four-game sweep by the Reds and shout, "Told ya so."

It really could go either way in this bipolar Cubs season.

The only thing we know about the Cubs is we know nothing at all.

We thought we knew the offense because we have seen most of those players together for 3½ seasons now.

They're near or at the top of the National League in many offensive categories and have scored 10 or more runs 10 times, so no reason to worry. But they also go into hibernation without warning and have scored one or no runs 17 times. They have been shut out seven times, three in the last two weeks.

What's the deal?

"I don't know," Kris Bryant said. "I remember seeing on TV, they put up our offensive categories and it was a bunch of categories we were in first. I had no clue. It was a nice surprise. But sometimes it's like (the hitting) just doesn't show up one day, and then a couple of days in a row it'll show up, and then it'll go away."

"It's tough being streaky like that, and I hate that as an individual, being a streaky player, but sometimes that's just how it goes. If we can find that more consistent approach and all we need to do is score four runs a game and let our pitchers do the job, we'll win probably every game. But it can't be like that every time."

We thought we knew the pitchers, or at least the rotation that went into spring training as arguably the best in the league. But other than Jon Lester, a certain All-Star, we're left with question marks.

Yu Darvish made his rehab start Monday at Class A South Bend after one of the most inauspicious starts for a big free agent in Cubs history. Kyle Hendricks and Jose Quintana have been hit-and-miss, while Tyler Chat-

Cubs' Darvish pitches strong 5 innings in rehab outing but tempers expectations

SOUTH BEND, Ind. — Under ordinary circumstances, Japanese sports journalist Katsushi Nagao never imagined visiting this city 100 miles east of Wrigley Field best known for its famous college football dateline.

"All I know about South Bend is Notre Dame and 'Rudy,'" said Nagao, the Naperville-based writer for Kyodo News America, Japan's premier news organization. "I never, ever thought I'd come here for a story, but this was worth it."

 Where Yu Darvish goes, Nagao

and a small corps of Japanese reporters follow. Among the country's baseball players, only Shohei Ohtani and Ichiro Suzuki command more interest from Nagao's readers than Darvish, who appeared to take a major step Monday night with a minor-league start that encouraged everybody but the cryptic right-hander.

"Not perfect, but I'm just glad I got through five," Darvish said through an interpreter. "My body condition wasn't there."

Maybe not, but Darvish looked stronger than he apparently felt, throwing 57 pitches — 41 for strikes for the Class A South Bend Cubs against the West Michigan Whitecaps. He gave up one run — a long homer — on three hits and struck out five without a walk. His velocity topped out at 94 mph and he clearly enjoyed a 62 mph curveball to strike out Reynaldo Rivera. He stayed away from his cut fastball. Only two Whitecaps worked the count to three balls on Darvish, who cast doubt on his next start and his future in a

Hoiberg needs right pieces for job

Versatile picks Carter, Hutchison sync well with coach's philosophy

On one hand, Bulls coach Fred Hoiberg's job has never changed — maximize his roster's potential and put his players in the best position to succeed.

On the other, this is a fourth straight offseason in which management's mandate has moved the goalposts, even if only slightly this time. At least both last summer and this one, it's happening with players who seemingly fit Hoiberg's philosophy.

"These are two very versatile players who I'm really excited about adding," Hoiberg said Management tabbed Hoiberg's offensive acumen and player-friendly approach as the missing ingredients for a 2015-16 team that had serious locker-room issues — and failed to make the playoffs. A last gasp at relevancy in 2016-17 featured the Executive vice president John Paxson said before last season — the first of a full rebuild after trading Jimmy Butler — that Hoiberg wouldn't be judged by wins and losses but by player development and holding players accountable. Hoiberg checked

Cubs bullpen needs quick fix

Ladies and gentlemen, please buckle your seat belts and return your tray tables to their locked and upright positions as we experience a sentence as turbulent as your basic Cubs relief appearance:

The Cubs need to trade for a reliever right now, maybe two, maybe three, but the worst part of needing to make a deal is that other teams know it, so the Cubs can't make a deal without overpaying, which means they're likely to wait to make a deal, which doesn't make them better right now and might make them worse, but that at least gives them a chance to get more out of their trade assets when they don't stink as much, but the bullpen's heavy use earlier this season has caught up to relievers to the point there's worry they can stop the stink reliably.

OK. Breathe. On second thought, don't. The Cubs are without closer Brandon Morrow, who hurt himself taking off his pants, which is as Cub as it gets, give or take a Sammy Sosa sneeze, and who knows how healthy Morrow will be going forward. They're without future closer Carl Edwards Jr., who is injured but less embarrassing. They're without much hope for Justin Wilson, the Tigers closer they acquired in trade who seemingly has pitched himself into mop-up territory after choking against the Dodgers last week.

But, hey, Stevie Sunshine is here to note that when the Reds sweep you in a four-game series in Cincinnati, you don't need a closer.

The Cubs, however, do need relievers everywhere else — consistent relievers, I mean — especially the spots where Pedro Strop, Brian Duensing and Randy Rosario used to be after they gave it up Sunday, Saturday and Thursday, respectively. Duensing and Rosario each gave up grand slams, while Strop made sure the Cubs gagged every bit of a five-run lead.

In all, the Cubs bullpen allowed five of 10 inherited runners in the series to score. Not counting catcher Chris Gimenez's ninth inning, Cubs relievers gave up 13 earned runs in 11<sup>2</sup>/<sub>3</sub> innings for an ERA of a perfect 10. Thanks for playing our game.

The bullpen's failure is more acute because the rotation is being held together with gauze and spittle. Yu Darvish is bad and hurt. Tyler Chatwood was in the delivery room Sunday, which at least meant he couldn't walk the stadium. Kyle Hendricks apparently has decided to support Chatwood by issuing sympathy walks. Jose Quintana is having trouble getting through the lineup the third time. The Cubs brought up some guy named Underwood to make his major-league debut Monday night at Dodger Stadium. Can Jon Lester pitch every game?

But because I always worry first about the bullpen, I'm quick to believe that's the place to start fixing things. Brad Hand would be the place to start, what with a strikeout rate and fielder independent pitching metric ranking with the best, but the Padres likely would ask for a ton from a team that already has traded a ton to get a World Series one year and a shot at others via the Quintana trade.

BRIAN CASSELLA/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Justin Wilson suffered a ninth-inning meltdown in a 4-3 loss to the Dodgers last Tuesday.

Other relievers worth tracking after the Nationals jumped on Kelvin Herrera are the Marlins' Kyle Barraclough and Drew Steckenrider, the Orioles' Zach Britton as he comes back from an Achilles injury and the Blue Jays' Ryan Tepera.

Other names likely are under consideration. They have to be. Theo Epstein and Jed Hoyer aren't stupid or negligent. I would guess they're comparison shopping the way they have been since, I don't know, forever. At some point, they're going to do something. Bullpens always change. Bullpens always need something. What the Cubs need are relievers who don't give opposing bullpens the opportunity to dance.

Greenberg, Golic get call from hall

Mike Greenberg and Mike Golic, whose 18-year ESPN radio and TV pairing as "Mike & Mike" ended last year, were voted into the Radio Hall of Fame, the Chicago-based institution announced Monday.

Other sports hosts to be inducted Nov. 15 during a $350-per-ticket dinner and reception in New York are syndicated personality Nanci Donnellan (aka "The Fabulous Sports Babe") and New York talker Mike Francesa.

Also among the 11 honorees for 2018 is longtime Chicago radio host Jonathon Brandmeier, or Johnny B., which he was so often referred to as.

"Mike & Mike" ended in November as Greenberg left to launch the thus-far underwhelming New York-based morning experiment "Get Up!" for ESPN. Trey Wingo assumed his old spot for ESPN's "Golic and Wingo," heard locally on WMVP-AM 1000.

A Northwestern graduate, Greenberg made a name for himself in Chicago media — at the late WMAQ-AM and SportsChannel, as well as WSCR-AM, CLTV and as a weekly columnist for the Copley-owned newspapers — before joining ESPN in 1996. He was an anchor for ESPNNews and then a "SportsCenter" anchor before teaming with Golic, a former Notre Dame and NFL player.

Brandmeier was a towering presence locally on arrival in Chicago from Phoenix in the 1980s. He is remembered locally for his time on the late WLUP-FM and WCKG-FM as well as WGN-AM 720 and WLS-AM 890 and his well-attended live shows.

Besides Greenberg, Golic, Donnellan, Francesa and Brandmeier, the class of 2018 includes advice dispenser Laura Schlessinger, host Mark Levin, host and programmer Kid Kelly, classic rock format creator Fred Jacobs and New York personalities Jim Kerr and Joan Hamburg.

Levin, whose syndicated show is heard evenings on WLS-AM, and Kelly were selected via public vote. Donnellan, Francesa, Hamburg and Jacobs were chosen by the Hall of Fame nominating committee. The remainder were picked by a panel of nearly 1,000 people connected with the radio industry.

"It's our mission to recognize the most impactful personalities and individuals to our medium and honor them," National Radio Hall of Fame Chairman Kraig T. Kitchin said. "We're proud to induct these individuals."

WORLD CUP

Mexico's goal: Control fate with victory

BY KEVIN BAXTER
Los Angeles Times

MOSCOW — Guillermo Ochoa doesn't need a slide rule or a calculator to figure out the complicated scenarios facing Mexico as it tries to win its group and advance to the second stage of the World Cup.

Instead, Mexico's goalkeeper has broken it down to the basics: Beat Sweden on Wednesday in distant Yekaterinburg, on the border separating Asia from Europe, and the team moves on. Lose, there's a chance Mexico goes home.

And that's just how he had figured it would go all along.

"We hadn't done any sort of mathematical calculations," Ochoa said at a news conference. "We knew that we were going to play for first place against Sweden."

"My dream, along with that of my teammates, is for us to stay here until the very last day. It's something that I believe in, that I feel, that I'm imagining and that I'm wishing for. And nobody here or anywhere else is going to keep me from dreaming that."

That's not the first time Ochoa has talked about dreams during a World Cup in which he's made a tournament-high 14 saves while allowing just one goal. But the World Cup could just as easily become a nightmare if Mexico doesn't manage at least a draw with Sweden.

Mexico needs a point to move on to the knockout round as the group champion; a win or draw will accomplish that. But a loss to Sweden, combined with a German win over South Korea in the other Group F finale, would open up a whole range of possibilities, many of which would end the tournament for El Tri.

If Sweden and Germany both win, for example, the three teams will finish group play with six points. Goal differential will determine who advances. If Germany and Sweden's margin of victory is two or more goals, that would send Mexico home. There are other even more complicated tiebreaking scenarios based on head-to-head results, margins of victory and, presumably, a coin flip or a game of paper-scissors-rock, that do not work in

HECTOR VIVAS/GETTY

In two matches, Mexico goalkeeper Guillermo Ochoa has a World Cup-high 14 saves.

Mexico's favor either.

So the easiest way to keep the dream alive would be to win.

"Our goal is clear: It's to finish first in the group," Ochoa said. "We have it in front of us, it's in our hands, it depends on us. We're not depending on anyone else."

"We're a national team whose goal is to go after games, to stand out, become protagonists and the way to do that is to play good soccer on the field."

Spain 2, Morocco 2: A video replay in stoppage time gave Spain the goal it needed to win Group B.

Spain sub Iago Aspas scored the late equalizer in Kaliningrad. His clever deflection off a cross from Dani Carvajal was initially disallowed for offside, but the video assistant referee overruled the call.

Spain, which advanced because it scored more goals than Portugal, will face host Russia on Sunday in the round of 16.

Portugal 1, Iran 1: Cristiano Ronaldo's missed penalty shot against Iran in Saransk cost Portugal first place in Group B.

Portugal advanced with a second-place finish and will face Uruguay on Saturday.

Portugal got on the board late in the first half when 34-year-old midfielder Ricardo Quaresma scored in the 45th minute. The team could have taken a 2-0 lead in the 53rd minute, but Ronaldo's low penalty shot was stopped by diving Iran goalkeeper Ali Beiranvand.

Karim Ansarifard scored a penalty deep into stoppage time for Iran.

Both Ronaldo's and Ansarifard's penalty shots were awarded after video review.

Uruguay 3, Russia 0: Luis Suarez and Edinson Cavani scored a goal each, and Uruguay went on to win in Samara, finishing undefeated in group play after handing the host nation its first loss of the Cup.

Both teams already booked spots in the knockout round, but Uruguay's victory put it at the top of Group A.

Uruguay, which also benefited from an own-goal in the first half, had its third straight shutout of the Cup.

Saudi Arabia 2, Egypt 1: Salem Aldawsari scored late in stoppage time to lift Saudi Arabia in Volgograd.

Mohamed Salah put Egypt ahead in the 22nd minute, but Salman Alfaraj got the Saudis level with a penalty kick in first-half stoppage time.

Egypt's Essam El Hadary started in goal and, at 45, set the record for oldest person to play in a Cup match.

BLACKHAWKS

Report: Duclair won't return

BY JIMMY GREENFIELD
Chicago Tribune

The Blackhawks parted ways with restricted free-agent forward Anthony Duclair after declining to make a qualifying offer, the Sun-Times reported Monday.

Per team policy, the Hawks would not comment regarding the status of their restricted free agents.

The Hawks also were required to make offers to forward Tomas Jurco, defenseman Adam Clendening and winger Michael Chaput, whom the Hawks acquired from the Canucks on Sunday for Tanner Kero.

If the Hawks don't tender offers to Duclair or Jurco it saves them around $2.5 million as they eye potential free agents. They are not expected to make a bid for free-agent center John Tavares, The Athletic reported Monday.

The Hawks have a little more than $9 million in cap space to work with, according to Capfriendly.com. Teams are currently in the one-week negotiating window with players but aren't permitted to sign free agents until July 1.

The Blackhawks acquired Jurco, 25, on Feb. 24, 2017, from the Red Wings for a 2017 third-round pick. He scored only one goal in 13 regular-season games for the Hawks and was a healthy scratch throughout their four-game sweep by the Predators in the first round of the playoffs.

Nevertheless, the Hawks signed the winger to a one-year extension worth $800,000. Jurco, a 2011 second-round pick, spent most of last season in Rockford, where he had 13 goals and 12 assists in 36 games. He was with the Hawks for 29 games, scoring six goals and four assists.

Duclair is 22 but the Hawks were his third organization; he was drafted in the third round by the Rangers in 2013 and then dealt to the Coyotes in 2015. The Hawks acquired him last January along with Clendening from the Coyotes for Richard Panik and Laurent Dauphin.

He had 20 goals during his rookie season with the Coyotes in 2015-16, dropped to five goals the next year and was struggling last season with nine goals and six assists in 33 games before being dealt to the Hawks.

DODGERS 2, CUBS 1

SEAN M. HAFLEY/GETTY-AFP

Cubs starter Duane Underwood Jr. allowed one run on two hits in four innings after navigating through a 41-pitch first Monday night.

Long time coming

After wiggling out of early jam, Underwood throws 4 solid innings

BY MARK GONZALES
Chicago Tribune

LOS ANGELES — Yu Darvish may rejoin the Cubs rotation as soon as the end of this week, and the likes of Adbert Alzolay and Alex Lange are expected to make contributions in future years.

But the Cubs' hopes of snapping a four-game losing streak and resuming their push toward a National League Central title relied Monday night on Duane Underwood Jr., one of the first draft selections of the Theo Epstein era.

Underwood survived a 41-pitch first inning, but Kike Hernandez smacked the second pitch of the second for a home run en route to the Dodgers' 2-1 victory at Dodger Stadium.

Underwood was lifted for a pinch hitter after pitching four innings of two-hit ball. His big-league career started auspiciously as he struck out Joc Pederson on an 86 mph changeup, but he ran into trouble when Matt Kemp fouled off seven two-strike pitches before drawing a walk on his 14th pitch to load the bases with two outs. But Underwood escaped when he got Yasmani Grandal to fly out.

Underwood, working with veteran catcher Chris Gimenez, displayed a 95-mph fastball with an 86-mph changeup and a 74-mph curve.

After the home run to Hernandez, his third in two games, Underwood retired eight of his final nine batters.

"He really has reinvented himself over the past couple of years," manager Joe Maddon said before the game. "He really has adopted a new work ethic. He got himself in shape."

Underwood's long-awaited arrival illustrates the need for pitching depth because of Darvish's injury and Tyler Chatwood's departure for the birth of his first child.

Although Underwood is only 23, he has been in the organization since being selected in the second round of the 2012 draft and has persevered long enough and

CUBS NOTES

Morrow may be back soon

BY MARK GONZALES
Chicago Tribune

LOS ANGELES — The back end of the Cubs bullpen could return to full strength within the next two weeks.

Closer Brandon Morrow could rejoin the Cubs without a minor-league rehabilitation assignment, manager Joe Maddon confirmed Monday.

"It shouldn't be much longer," Maddon said. "If he's good to go, he's good to go."

Morrow was scheduled to throw a bullpen session before Monday night's game against the Dodgers, and he may need only one more mound session before rejoining the team as long as the stiffness in his back has completely subsided.

Morrow is eligible to be activated from the 10-day disabled list Wednesday.

The prognosis also looks encouraging for Carl Edwards Jr., who reported that his right shoulder was fine one day after he threw off a mound. Edwards is tentatively scheduled to throw off a mound again with the possibility of starting a minor-league rehabilitation assignment soon.

Edwards hasn't pitched since May 29 because of inflammation.

has shown enough glimpses of improvement to start against the defending NL champions.

"His fastball is more consistent," Jaron Madison, the Cubs director of player development, said last week. "He's as healthy as he ever has been. He's really focused on throwing strikes, which is the big thing. He's not trying to trick guys or trying to throw the ball by everybody. He's just letting his stuff work for him."

Despite the Cubs giving him a $1 million bonus, Underwood's career appeared at a crossroads after elbow and forearm strains in 2015 and '16, and he was an early cut in 2017 spring training.

Third baseman Kris Bryant missed his third consecutive start because of a sore left shoulder. Maddon said he didn't believe the injury was serious enough for a DL stint but didn't rule it out.

Chatwood update: Tyler Chatwood was placed on the paternity list to make room for starter Duane Underwood Jr., but could return to the rotation as soon as Friday against the Twins.

"I don't know where he's at with his throwing program," Maddon said. "It's not impossible."

Chatwood and his wife, Veronica, became parents to Owen Cruze, a baby boy, born Sunday night.

Second fiddle: First baseman Anthony Rizzo, second baseman Javier Baez, Bryant and catcher Willson Contreras are in second place at their respective positions in the latest National League All-Star balloting released Monday.

Of the four, only Contreras, with 945,347 votes, is within 100,000 of the leader at his position (Buster Posey of the Giants). Addison Russell trails Brandon Crawford of the Giants and Dansby Swanson of the Braves in the shortstop balloting. Fan voting concludes July 5.

Midway through last season, Underwood had a blunt discussion with Epstein about his future, and Underwood responded with 13 wins and 138 innings — both career highs — for Double-A Tennessee.

Although Underwood posted a 3-7 record and 4.27 ERA at Triple-A Iowa, he did have a 13<sup>2</sup>/<sub>3</sub>-inning scoreless stint.

"It's really just minimizing mistakes, being consistent and understanding in Triple A that if you make mistakes, the ball flies," Madison said. "Those guys are good hitters, so you have to minimize mistakes."

WHITE SOX

In outfield, Sox's Engel a fly guy

His range, lack of errors make up for subpar hitting

BY PHIL THOMPSON
Chicago Tribune

When A's third baseman Chad Pinder cracked a liner to center field in the nightcap of Friday's doubleheader and the ball started sinking and tilting toward right field, Adam Engel was focused less on whether he'd make a highlight-reel catch and more on what would go wrong if he didn't make the catch at all.

But the White Sox center fielder dived to his left, gloved the ball and rolled over with the ball firmly secured.

"Any time you come in on a ball and have to dive in closer to the ground, that's a tough play because when you have to worry about the ball getting past you ... it's definitely a do-or-die," Engel said. "You have to get it in there, and if not, if the ball squirts by you, it could be extra bases, and you don't want that."

Later in that inning, Engel bagged Pinder trying to take third on Franklin Barreto's flyout.

"That's just more of a natural play," he said of his arm strength.

It's also one of two assists Engel has within the last week after just one all season before that. Entering Monday, Engel topped all outfielders in range factor per nine innings (3.09).

Speed certainly helps, which his 10 stolen bases can attest to (he goes by @ManofSteal15 on Twitter).

Reps and reading how the ball comes off the bat also play big roles.

He hasn't had an error since May 18 against the Rangers after being charged with two in April.

"I think his jumps over the last month, maybe six weeks, have really gotten better and back to the (Engel) everybody saw," manager Rick Renteria said. "He really has been getting off the ball very, very well, running down some difficult plays and continues to improve with the bat."

Yes, the bat.

It's no secret that if someone else on the roster had Engel's chops defensively his average would make his starting spot vulnerable. He was batting .125 in April and seemed to turn a corner the next month, batting .257, but now he has settled at .211.

"He has been in the lineup every day," Renteria said. "I haven't limited his usage out there based on his bat."

In fact, he wants to keep giving Engel steady at-bats believing he'll get more comfortable at the plate. The A's series has started a modest four-game hitting streak.

Engel said he believes strong play in the field can carry over to the batter's box, and if it doesn't, he can at least compartmentalize the two.

"I think one of the hardest things we have to do as professionals is when one facet isn't doing great, make sure every other part of your game isn't suffering from it," Engel said. "So if you get some defensive momentum and take it into the plate, that's definitely huge."

For now, Engel's highest value to the team comes from his glove, something the former high school shortstop has labored over in college, the minors and in practice.

"I was a big Barry Larkin fan growing up," the Cincinnati native said about the Reds' Hall of Fame shortstop.

When he got to Louisville, coaches gave him a choice as a freshman: Ride the pine as an infielder or learn the outfield. He chose the latter.

He was taught the fundamentals by then-assistant coach Chris Lemonis, who also worked in college with Reds left fielder Adam Duvall and Nationals left fielder Chris Dominguez.

After the Sox drafted Engel in 2013, he felt he took another leap forward under the guidance of minor-league instructors Doug Sisson and Aaron Rowand. Rowand, a former Sox outfielder himself, was a Gold Glove winner with the Phillies in 2007.

They also drilled Engel on technique. "You can speed things up knowing that you can do everything the right way," Engel said. "So as the game speeds up, you have to speed up a little bit, (but) you have the fundamentals down."

"(Rowand) helped me out a lot in the minor leagues. ... (Sisson's) the guy that definitely built the foundation even more so than what I was doing in college. I am really close with him now, and he's back with us in the minor-league system."

"Those two guys are, as far as outfield play, the guys that have really helped me refine my skill set out there."

wood has been wild-and-wilder. Their second-best starter has been Mike Montgomery, who will be shunted back to the bullpen after Darvish returns.

We had a few clues about the bullpen, which President Theo Epstein renovated last offseason with the addition of free agents Brandon Morrow and Steve Cishek to the back end with Carl Edwards Jr., Pedro Strop and the re-signed Brian Duensing. They began Monday ranked third in the NL with a 3.12 ERA, an indication things will be OK. But they also were 11th in June (4.26) and show signs of vulnerability with Morrow and Edwards on the disabled list.

Maybe the only thing we can be sure of is the defense, which leads the majors in defensive runs saved and features Gold Glove winners in right field (Jason Heyward) and at first base (Anthony Rizzo), and potential Gold Glovers at shortstop (Addison Russell) and in center field (Albert Almora Jr.).

Second baseman Javier Baez and catcher Willson Contreras are the most dazzling defenders but won't win any awards because their high-risk style can lead to errors.

Still, would you rather have anyone else at either position?

The Cubs have eight position players who rank among the best in the NL at their primary spots in wins above replacement, including four outfielders: Kyle Schwarber (second in left, 1.8 WAR); Ben Zobrist (third in left, 1.8); Heyward (fourth in right, 1.1); and Almora (fifth in center, 2.1). Three infielders are also near the top: Baez (second at second, 2.3); Russell (third at short, 2.0); and Bryant (fifth at third, 1.7).

The only position player lagging is Rizzo, a puzzling 15th at first base with an 0.3 WAR. But after his awful first month, Rizzo has 41 RBIs since May 1 and was tied for the NL lead with nine game-winning RBIs entering Monday.

"Just roll with the season," Rizzo said. "I can't put too much (weight) into what's going on. You have to keep the big picture in mind, and there are a lot more at-bats to come. It's a day-to-day grind."

Rizzo and Bryant are the two biggest pieces of the offensive puzzle, and each has seen his OPS fall from last year — Rizzo's from .899 to .757, Bryant's from .946 to .864.

Has Bryzzo's stock fallen, or are we reading too much into first-half numbers that easily could be forgotten by the end of the season?

Bryant pointed out they don't feel pressure because the lineup has so many other talented hitters such as Baez, Schwarber and Almora.

"It's not just up to us," Bryant said. "That pressure isn't on us to do that because our team is so dang good, that it's almost relieving we don't have to feel that. But if we can turn it on and get hot at the same times, then we'll be a really scary team."

Rizzo doesn't care if fans are panicky about the streaky nature of the 2018 Cubs. He said they come to work every day and "expect to be great," knowing it doesn't always happen.

"That's KB's and my mentality," he said. "And Javy and J-Hey and everybody. (Bryant and I) hit in the thick of the order, and you want to produce all the time. But it's a long season and we can't ride the roller coaster as hard as some people. We have to take the big-picture (view)."

But as they opened a four-game series against the rival Dodgers on Monday, the Cubs' roller coaster was on the way down, looking for a market correction.

Does it matter now, with more than three months to play?

"Our fans need to be entertained, so if you want to keep riding that emotional roller coaster, go ahead," manager Joe Maddon said Thursday afternoon in Cincinnati.

The Cubs then lost four straight, including Sunday's epic collapse.

So enjoy the ride ... or not.

Either way, it's probably not going to stop.

BULLS

Carter's mother gives her side

Says family decided to back away from agent targeted by FBI

BY MALIKA ANDREWS
Chicago Tribune

The newest Bulls launched their professional careers Monday with a news conference at the Advocate Center, their families watching from a row of folding chairs.

No. 22 pick Chandler Hutchison, who spent four years at Boise State, is an NBA-ready player poised to take the next step. No. 7 pick Wendell Carter Jr., meanwhile, was a highly coveted one-and-done from Duke who can now leave behind the NCAA's messy rules and regulations.

In February, Carter's name was listed among players who met with Christian Dawkins, a sports agent who was one of 10 people arrested as the result of an FBI investigation into corruption in college basketball. Dawkins had been part of an elaborate scheme to bribe high school players and their families and steer them toward certain colleges.

After Monday's news conference, Kyli Carter told the Tribune she was first introduced to Dawkins when her son was in ninth grade. She said they met through a family friend who had grown up with her in Mississippi. When Wendell Jr. was in 10th grade, Dawkins, Wendell Carter Sr. and Kyli met at a Longhorn Steakhouse.

Although Kyli said she ordered only water, which was free, her name was listed on a photo of the FBI report published by Yahoo Sports next to a charge for $106.36.

"This is exactly how it happened: We walk over to the table, and Christian is very young," Kyli said. "So, for my husband, it threw up a red flag. It was something about the way he moved or said something. We were sitting there. We asked the waiter to get our waters. Before our waiters could get the waters to our table, my husband had stood up and said, 'I thank you for your time.'"

According to Kyli, the Carters then left the restaurant. Kyli, who at the time had just been let go from her position at the Atlanta airport, said Dawkins offered to help her find a job. After the meeting at Longhorn, Kyli said she and Dawkins kept in contact sporadically. She sent him her resume.

"He said that he wanted to work and make sure I got a job," Kyli said. "And then one day my husband said, 'Are you still talking to that Christian Dawkins guy?' I said, 'Yeah, I'm still communicating with him a little bit.' He said, 'Babe, I think we should just leave that alone.' I was like, 'OK, cool.' And that was that."

Kyli said Dawkins reached out again to try to reschedule the meeting, but she refused. During her son's year at Duke, Kyli was an outspoken critic of the NCAA. At the Knight Commission on Intercollegiate Athletics conference, Kyli compared the NCAA system to slavery and the prison system.

"We felt like we were guilty and had to prove ourselves innocent," Kyli said. "We didn't have to be frustrated in fear because we knew (we had done) nothing wrong. But what frustrated me was that y'all knew this was a lying dog. Why is it so hard for the NCAA to see what this guy is doing? Yeah, we were there. We got water. You sat there and ate and expensed that as a recruitment dinner with us."

Duke athletic director Kevin White said in a statement that the school "immediately reviewed" the Carters' encounter with Dawkins "and, based on the available information, determined there are no eligibility issues."

Kyli said she will take a step back now. She will still advise parents informally because she knows how it felt not to have someone to guide her through college basketball, but now it is her son's time.

"It is an honor just to be here," Wendell Jr. said during the news conference. "Some of the greatest players to ever play the game played in the same spot, so it is an honor just to have the Bulls uniform on."

Taking issue

Bulls guard Dunn disputes criticism of his work ethic

BY SHANNON RYAN
Chicago Tribune

Bulls guard Kris Dunn snarled his face to describe the tenacity he brings to basketball.

"I'm a pit bull," he said. "You ever see one of them scary red-nose (pit bulls)? Yeah, that's me."

Dunn knows that his work ethic has been questioned this offseason. But he said he doesn't understand why, and he doesn't believe the claims have validity.

And he certainly didn't like hearing the criticism.

"I was definitely offended by it," he told the Tribune Monday at the KPMG Windy City Skills Challenge at Soldier Field, where he helped children involved in golf development programs test their skills in basketball in conjunction with the Women's PGA Championship later this week at Kemper Lakes.

"My dad worked hard in life. My brothers and sisters and me (took) hard work very seriously. It is the only way to succeed."

Earlier Monday, he worked out at Advocate Center before the Bulls' news conference with their new draft picks.

Previously, team sources indicated Dunn attended to a personal matter that made him not immediately available for one scheduled workout and some minor concern existed over Dunn's work in the weight room. In a recent interview on WSCR-AM 670, executive vice president John Paxson denied any displeasure with Dunn's offseason workouts.

A Sun-Times report in early June indicated the Bulls might draft a point guard because they were not satisfied by Dunn's work habits in May and early June.

"You don't get too caught up in it," Dunn said. "You just keep doing what you do best. I know I work hard. I don't have to prove it to anybody. I just have to show it on the court. I have no answers for (why the rumors originated). Whoever put it out there, that's how they felt. Questioning my work ethic? That's just (not valid). I work hard. If I'm not working, I'm around my family. Absolutely nothing (has changed about workouts or preparation)."

"I know I work hard. I don't have to prove it to anybody."

The Timberwolves drafted Dunn with the fifth overall pick in the 2016 draft out of Providence and traded him to the Bulls before last season along with Zach LaVine and the rights to Lauri Markkanen in exchange for Jimmy Butler.

He seemed to make a jump in his second season in the league averaging 13.4 points and 1.98 steals per game.

Dunn said he's looking forward to a better season after the Bulls missed the playoffs for the second time in three years with a 27-55 record.

"I'm excited," Dunn said. "We have some good players. It will help us with games and help bring excitement to the fans. We didn't have the year that we wanted last year. Hopefully this year we can get it back by going out and competing each and every game."

"I'm going to try to be a little more mature on the court. Understanding of the clock and game situation we're in, who has it rolling, who doesn't have it rolling. Just playing my game and being aggressive."

And now Hoiberg is tasked with the dual goals of player development and winning, making sure Carter and Hutchison gain experience without entitlement minutes. While Paxson has emphasized patience and downplayed playoff expectations, he also has said he can't sit through another season in which a high lottery pick is the priority.

So Carter and Hutchison aren't the only ones who need to produce next season.

"The thing I'm excited about with training camp is it's going to be open competition. It should make for a very competitive camp," Hoiberg said. "I know these two players will come in and work extremely hard. They're not going to back down from any type of challenge."

That was apparent as quickly as Sunday night. That's when Carter shot Hoiberg a text, saying he wanted to get up some shots at the Advocate Center when he landed for his first night in Chicago as a Bull.

Paxson, general manager Gar Forman and Hoiberg envision Carter as Lauri Markkanen's running buddy for the next decade.

"You have a modern-day big with Wendell," Hoiberg said. "I've talked a lot to Coach K (Duke coach Mike Krzyzewski) in the last week about the different ways he utilized Wendell's skill set. They ran a lot of high-low with him and (Marvin) Bagley with Wendell out on the floor making the pass."

"The other thing I was very impressed with as the year went on was his ability to stretch the floor with his 3-point shot. He shot above 41 percent from the 3-point line. He can playmake, put the ball on the floor. And he'll help us defensively. He's an excellent rim protector."

Hoiberg sounds equally excited to add Hutchison, who said he knew the Bulls have been high on him since he was a sophomore at Boise State.

"The thing that impressed me most about his game was his ability to get the ball off the defensive glass and push it down the floor and facilitate offense," Hoiberg said. "He'll fit well with the way we want to play with pace and with speed, getting our guys out running the wings. He had more coast-to-coast plays than anybody in this draft."

Carter and Hutchison join a young core featuring Markkanen, Kris Dunn, Zach LaVine, Bobby Portis and Denzel Valentine.

Though nobody expects a 50-win season, they also don't expect a repeat of 27-55.

Adding two seemingly low-maintenance players who emphasize work and winning should help.

"Development is as important as anything when you have a young team," Hoiberg said. "You look at last year, we had goals of competing and playing at a high level every time we stepped on the floor, whether it was a practice or a game or a shootaround. And I thought we accomplished that."

"Our guys bought into getting better. They came in early and stayed late. A lot of our players last year had career-type years. Our job for myself and my staff is to get these players better. There are a lot of things you see when you watch film you think you can help with and try to clean up right away."

Both Carter and Hutchison embraced entering near the ground floor of a rebuild but talked more about winning and making an immediate impact.

"You look at all the best teams in the league over the years, they had a time when they were rebuilding with a young core. To be there with the foundation is pretty special," Hutchison said. "I don't think I do just one thing where you plug me into a spot and know I'm going to be great at one thing. I have a lot of different weapons, and I'm useful in a lot of different situations. I see that as being really valuable in the NBA, especially now, being able to play in different positions, handle the ball, rebound, defend as well with my size and also playmake."

Added Carter: "For me to play with so many great players at Duke, it shows I'm able to play alongside some of the greatest players in college basketball and still hold my own, which I think spoke volumes. I didn't go out and have 30- or 40-point games. But I did all the things that are necessary to win. I thought that was very important. And we're coming to win."

So is Hoiberg.

"As you watch the playoffs this year, the teams that have multiple handlers and facilitators are the hardest to guard," he said.

The Bulls believe they added two more.

Megan Rapinoe, left, of the NWSL's Seattle Reign and Sue Bird of the WNBA's Seattle Storm have been a couple since 2016.

Seattle's power couple

Relationship between partners Bird, Rapinoe gives strength to others

BY STEFANIE LOH
Seattle Times

Two of Seattle's biggest sports stars sit side-by-side on a couch at Seattle Pacific University on this sunny spring day bantering playfully as they describe the challenges that come with a rite of passage many couples can identify with: Moving in together.

After dating for about a year and a half, the Seattle Reign's Megan Rapinoe moved into Seattle Storm star Sue Bird's Queen Anne condo this year. It has been a mostly smooth transition, Bird says, smiling.

The women pack a double dose of Olympic-level athletic prowess into one household.

Bird, 37, is a two-time WNBA champion with the Storm, a four-time Olympic gold medalist, a three-time FIBA World Champion, and won two NCAA titles at UConn.

Rapinoe, 32, boasts an equally impressive resume. She, too, has an Olympic gold medal, along with gold and silver Women's World Cup medals to go with the NCAA soccer title she won at the University of Portland in 2005.

But while the medals stay locked in a bank safe deposit box, the pair had to find space in their shared Queen Anne dwelling for some other collections: Bird's vast assortment of sneakers, and Rapinoe's seemingly endless wardrobe. Rapinoe co-founded a clothing line with her twin sister, Rachael, and has a reputation as a spiffy dresser with a unique sense of style.

"Megan is very much into fashion. And I wouldn't just call it clothing," Bird says. "She's into everything — clothing, bags, shoes. She's on top of the new stuff for sure. I love sneakers. My storage room is 75 percent sneakers."

Try stuffing all that into one urban condo. Needless to say, some skillful negotiations took place.

"I was like, 'Can I have this shelf?'" Rapinoe says.

"Five shelves," Bird clarifies.

Rapinoe: "Then, a month later, I was like, 'Can I have another shelf?'"

"Ten shelves," Bird interjects.

"Now, I have the whole second bedroom closet," Rapinoe says, beaming.

"It was kinda one of those things where you have to just inch your way through it."

How two of the biggest stars of the two most popular women's team sports in the United States became an iconic couple is a tale that's attracted rabid interest nationwide since last summer, when the usually private Bird revealed in an interview with ESPNW that she's gay and dating Rapinoe.

That story blew up in part because, despite recent advances in LGBTQ rights, it's still somewhat unusual for high-profile athletes to come out as gay during their careers. Bird and Rapinoe are A-listers within their respective realms, and news that they were dating vaulted them toward the Ellen DeGeneres/Portia DeRossi stratosphere of iconography within the LGBTQ community.

"At the end of the day, Sue's coming out and Megan being so open (about her sexuality) it's not the impact within their leagues (that's most noteworthy), it's the courage they inspire in those kids who've been told they're straight all their lives and are still trying to find their way," says Cyd Zeigler, founder of OutSports.com, a site dedicated to telling the stories of LGBT athletes.

Zeigler co-founded OutSports in 1999. In that time, he can't recall another out LGBT couple that combined the wattage of star power Bird and Rapinoe represent.

"They're two legends in their sports. You have one of the highest profile and best female soccer players in the history of the U.S., and one of the highest profile and best female basketball players, together," Zeigler says.

"As a couple, they speak to other issues that a light isn't always shined on in sports," adds Hudson Taylor, the founder of Athlete Ally, a nonprofit that advocates for inclusion for LGBT athletes in sports. "By having two (out, lesbian female) athletes dating one another, it allows you to focus a deeper personal lens on what LGBTQ relationships are like on a daily basis."

So, from interviews with Bird and Rapinoe and those closest to them, here's a glimpse at how this superstar pairing came to be, and what life is like for the preeminent Seattle sports couple.

Opposites attract

The question is posed to Bird and Rapinoe: Closet space battles aside, what's been the biggest adjustment in living together? Does either woman have habits that annoy the other?

Bird doesn't even need to think about it.

"Oh, like the way she leaves all the lights on? It drives me insane," she says, throwing some major side eye at Rapinoe, who grins and pats Bird's leg in conciliatory fashion.

"I just live harder," Rapinoe says, eliciting a laugh from Bird. "I'm not necessarily loud, but it's kinda like, I was vacuuming and I whacked the wall."

"So now all of a sudden, I have this huge dent," Bird interjects.

"Or," Rapinoe continues, "I was playing with a yo-yo and I smacked the floor."

"Dent there," Bird quips, rolling her eyes.

"I just bang around a little more," Rapinoe says, shrugging unapologetically.

Cue another eye roll from Bird, who nonetheless, can't quite conceal an affectionate smile. It's a tacit acknowledgment that whether at home or out in the world, this hard-living, rough-and-tumble firebrand who dents things and crashes around, is exactly who Rapinoe is.

In many ways, she's the opposite of Bird, the tactful, more reserved member of the relationship, who's more likely to conceal her emotions than tweet them in a burst of spontaneity.

Rapinoe's always been one to wear her heart on her sleeve, says her twin sister, Rachael Rapinoe.

"Once Meg knows in her heart that something is 'right' or 'wrong,' she's like, 'OK, this is it,'" Rachael says. "She's definitely always been one to stand on the right side of history, and she's going to be one of its leaders. When she's convinced about something, she's not going to be swayed."

That doesn't surprise anyone who has followed Rapinoe's career. In 2016, the outspoken midfielder publicly demonstrated her support for then-49ers quarterback Colin Kaepernick and the Black Lives Matter movement by kneeling during the national anthem before Reign games. She has also been vocal about the pay differential between the U.S. men's and women's national soccer teams, and has been a strong advocate for LGBTQ rights.

That unshakable conviction in her beliefs helps explain why Rapinoe's acceptance of her sexuality came much more easily than it did for either her girlfriend or her twin sister.

The twins came out to each other during their freshman year of college at the University of Portland. Rachael was going through a rough breakup, and as Megan probed to find out why her sister was so sad, Rachael finally revealed her big secret: She had been dating a girl.

Megan's response caught Rachael off guard.

"As I was telling her about everything, she was like, 'Oh, well, me too. I'm dating a girl, too, if it makes you feel any better,'" Rachael says.

The sisters realized they'd both secretly been seeing women for the last year, but each had been afraid to tell the other.

Thereafter, even though Rachael continued to struggle with her sexuality due in part to her religious beliefs, Megan fully embraced her identity as a gay woman. After years of always feeling different while growing up, realizing she was gay was liberating for Megan.

"It was the first time she had ever felt free, and she really celebrated it from Day 1," says Rachael, who has since also come out as a lesbian.

"I feel really lucky that I didn't internally struggle with it," Megan adds. "I think sometimes I come from that perspective, and obviously that's not always the case for everyone."

Bird's path toward self-acceptance took a little longer.

She dated women in college at UConn but did not come out to her family until 2003, during her second year with the Storm.

"It wasn't some inner struggle. It was just that the journey took me to my 23rd year of life to be able to figure it out," Bird says. "It was a combination of being more comfortable, being a little older and more mature, and then finally just not caring."

Bird says her family and friends were all very supportive, and since then, she's been out around loved ones and teammates for years. But in line with her inherently shy personality and how carefully she guards her privacy, she never saw the need to publicly announce her sexuality.

"I kinda always felt like I am out, for all intents and purposes. So I always came from the standpoint of, 'Why does writing it in an article or saying it in an article make me gay?'" Bird says. "That doesn't make me gay or not. I'm living my life, I'm not lying, I don't hide it."

She'd been through two serious relationships before she met Rapinoe. But until now, Bird has never publicly discussed who she's dating.

In contrast, Rapinoe's previous relationships with Australian soccer player Sarah Walsh, and then Seattle musician Sera Cahoon played out openly over social media.

Bird and Rapinoe were familiar with each other from the Seattle sports scene but never really socialized until they hit it off at a sponsor event at the 2016 Rio Olympics.

"It was kinda like, 'OK, we both live in Seattle, we should be friends. Why aren't we friends?'" Rapinoe says.

By September 2016, they were dating. Characteristically, Bird was initially careful about who she broke the news to.

Brad Barnett has been Bird's best friend since the age of 2. They grew up together in Syosset, N.Y., they've shared a multitude of childhood secrets, and their friendship is replete with inside jokes no one else understands.

"We'll finish each other's sentences, we'll have a whole conversation using just movie quotes, and if you don't know what movie it is, you'll have no idea what we're talking about," Barnett says, laughing. "We laugh at all the same things, we get on a roll and start making fun of the same person, and my wife is like, 'I can't deal with you two. You're just annoying.'"

To this day, they talk or text almost daily, and Barnett has been privy to the most intimate details of Bird's life.

So, in the fall of 2016, Barnett suspected Bird was dating someone new before she deigned to tell him. He even managed to guess who she was seeing.

"I always have a sense when Sue may or may not be seeing somebody," Barnett says. "So at one point, just flat out, I go, 'Are you dating someone? Just tell me.'"

Bird demurred. Barnett pressed.

"She hinted that this person is a little more out there in the media and the community, and this was right around the Colin Kaepernick stuff," Barnett says. "So I said, 'Sue, are you dating Megan Rapinoe?' She just starts hysterical laughing and goes, 'Yes!' And we laughed for like five minutes. (Rapinoe) is the other female star in Seattle, so I'd see her around at games. And I knew she was Sue's type. She was cute and athletic, so I was like, 'I could see them dating.'"

Friends and family say Sue and Megan have been good for one another.

"I think the two of them have really helped each other as far as staying in shape all the time and eating right," Barnett says. "It's your best friend, your girlfriend, a trainer and a dietitian in one."

Bird agrees with her best friend.

"It's nice to be going through the same thing," Bird says. "It's very similar, the things you go through: mindsets of things, team chemistry, dealing with a coach. So it's nice to have a sounding board at home that just understands."

"If I tried to tell my sister about something that happened in practice today, I would have to explain. With Megan, I don't have to explain. It's like just familiar enough, and the themes are sort of the same, with coaches and players, that it's a nice commonality."

Rachael thinks being around Bird has heightened Megan's self-discipline.

"Meg has never really loved working out, and she's never really been that regimented about her eating," Rachael says. "Sue completely revamped her eating and nutrition, which — in my opinion — has 100 percent boosted her game. I think this last year and a half, she's the strongest and fittest she's ever been."

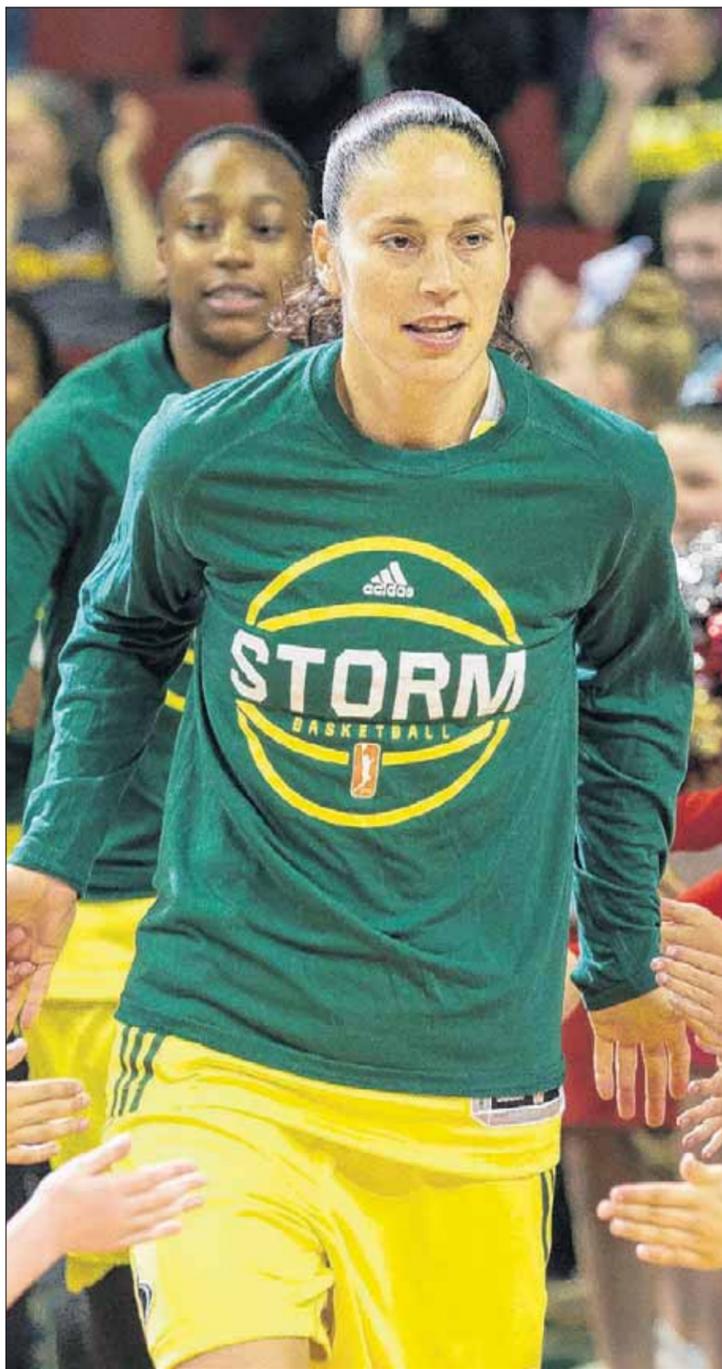

Bird follows a diet high in vegetables and low in sugar and dairy, and regulates when she eats her carbs.

Rapinoe adopted a similar diet after she and Bird started dating, and she swears it's made her more effective on the soccer pitch.

"I was sort of undereating at the wrong times, and eating the right things at the wrong times," Rapinoe says. "And I was not eating enough, which did not allow me to train as hard as I could have."

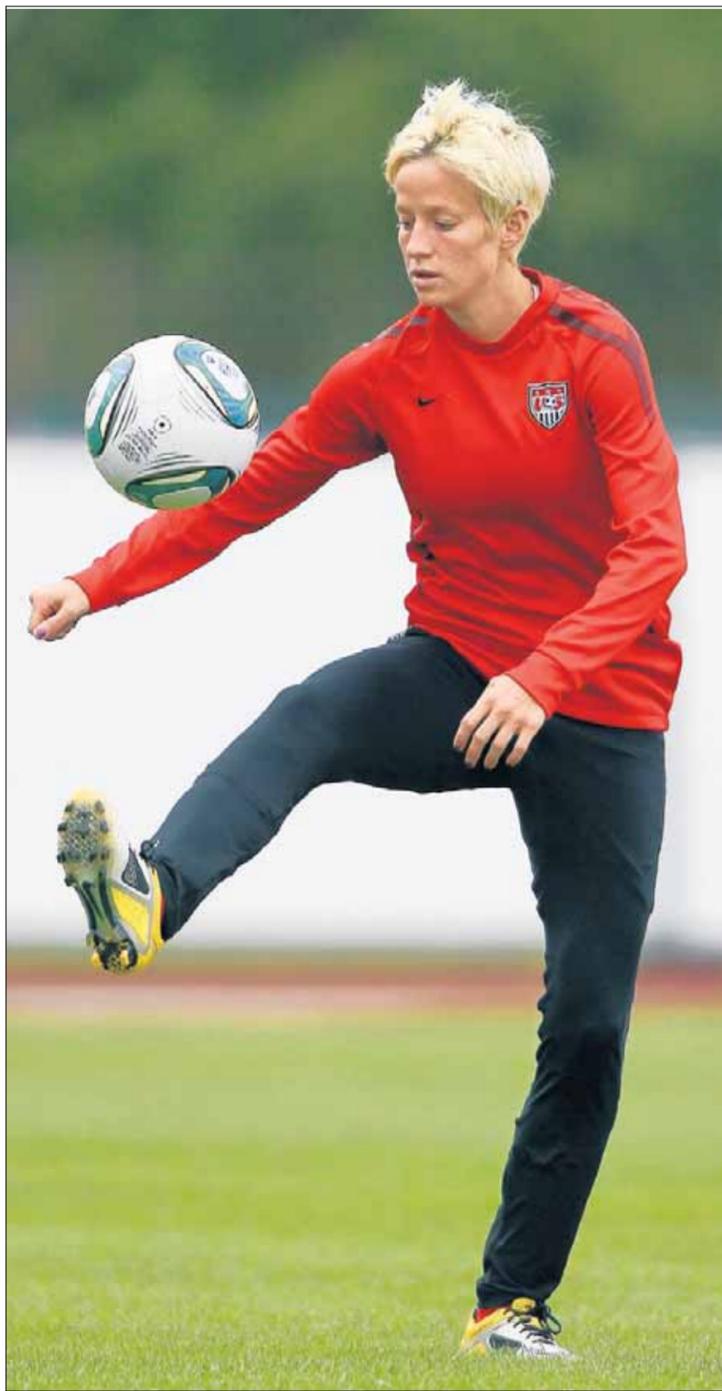

But aside from the positive ways they've rubbed off on each other, the couple has also realized that together, they've made an outsized impact on their community.

Whether they're cruising Lake Washington on Rapinoe's pontoon boat, having dinner at their favorite restaurants, or out for a night with teammates, Bird and Rapinoe are used to having people come up to say hello.

"I joke about how I should just walk around with a camera and take people's phone numbers to send them pictures because I was basically just always holding other people's phones," says Barnett, who visited the couple in Seattle with his wife during Pride weekend last year.

"We went to all the festivities and the parties and it was great. Everyone loves them together and everyone wants to get a picture taken and an autograph."

To some extent, that's always been the case. Bird and Rapinoe say they haven't gotten any more attention than normal since Sue's revelation that they're a couple, and they haven't found it difficult to maintain their privacy despite the steady stream of LGBT youth who come up to thank them for being an inspiration.

But, it's not just the kids who approach them.

"What's interesting is that I get a lot of older women, too, (for) whom, I think, 20 years ago, it was much more difficult to be open about your sexuality," Bird says.

These women are often in their 50s or older. Frequently, they thank Bird and tell her stories about how they couldn't come out because of their families, or because it simply wasn't accepted in society and they never felt like they could be themselves.

"Gay marriage wasn't legal then," Bird says. "But now they get to live their life. And in some ways, they're just really thankful that there are younger people willing to push that envelope. They're like, 'Hey, I just want to say thank you. Because you guys have been living openly, it's given me the confidence to do the same.'"

Those stories resonate with Bird. They're constant reminders that the simple act of allowing the public a glimpse into the life she shares with Rapinoe has made a difference in someone else's life.

"I think a lot of people who were like me at the time felt, 'Yes, I was living my life, but I don't have to come out publicly,'" Bird says. "You kinda say, 'Well, straight people don't have to come out.' I understand now that's not necessarily the right way to look at it."

"Megan and I would have conversations about it, and she opened my eyes to another way of looking at it, which is that in today's time, in today's society, it's still important to kind of say it to make it the norm."

Rapinoe has always felt that way.

"Visibility is king — or queen," Rapinoe says. "Until we don't have any more discrimination of any kind around the country or in the world, it's kind of important, I think, for people in certain positions (to be publicly out), whether that be a boss, an athlete or a politician."

"Some people have bigger platforms that can do a lot of good, and I think it's just as important for someone who doesn't have a big platform to be out and visible and just make it normal, and make it a total nonissue."

Rapinoe has definitely made an impact on Bird in a multitude of ways.

"I have opinions, and they can be set," Bird says. "And she challenges me in ways that I think can be hard at times because it forces you to look at things very differently. It's been healthy for me. While my nutrition has always been healthy, my mind is a little healthier as well."

So, a final question is posed: What's one thing you can reveal about each other that people might not know?

The two women glance at each other quizzically. For a minute, they're stumped. But for different reasons.

Rapinoe is wondering what she's allowed to divulge about her enigmatic girlfriend; Bird is just genuinely at a loss for an answer.

"I don't know," Bird says, shrugging. "This is a tough one because I feel like she's an open book."

"Yeah, and Sue's not an open book," Rapinoe says, emphatically.

She glances fondly at Bird and smiles.

"You are with me, though."

"I would say," Rapinoe begins carefully, looking at Bird. "You're a lot more emotional than people see. Like, much more open with me."

Her response inspires Bird. She knows where to go with this now.

"She's very attentive. And very selfless in the relationship," Bird says. Then, to Rapinoe, "You're very willing to give of yourself."

Cher sneaks in for a look at 'Cher Show'

Showbiz legend says she's committed to smoothing out a few rough spots

BY CHRIS JONES
 Chicago Tribune

The pop culture polyglot known as Cher snuck quietly into Chicago this past weekend. She was here to see three weekend preview performances of "The Cher Show," a new Broadway musical about her life, work and loves that has its official out-of-town opening in Chicago on Thursday.

The 72-year-old iconoclast hadn't seen the show in production before Saturday night. In this edited transcript, she spoke for the first time about the show, exclusively with the Tribune after Sunday's matinee.

Q: So what did you think? Inquiring minds want to know.

A: Some parts of it are really fabulous. We're going to work on the other parts. In many parts, it was much, much better than I thought it would be. And there were no parts where I wanted to gouge my eyes out.

It needs work. I'm not supposed to say that but I don't care. But you know, I was really very surprised by how close to real these people feel. Some of the boys are so on the mark, it's creepy.

Q: What was going through your head as you were watching?

A: That's really hard to say. Sometimes, I was having a blast. Sometimes, my mind was wandering. I think those are the parts that are going to get better.

Q: Have you been giving notes?

A: Yes. I have been sitting next to Jason (Moore), the director. I tell him things. My brain is going so fast as I try to glean all the nuances. There are lines in the show that sound like quotes but aren't quite right. I've been telling him the real quotes. I have a lot to say. And I am pushing them to do three dance songs in a concert-style way at the end, a bit like they do in "Mamma Mia." I think the audience would like that.

Q: A lot of these shows are scared to criticize their subjects. And I bet everyone is scared to death of you. Are you interested in the truth about yourself?

A: I think I'm honest. My life is 72 years. My career is 53 years. So the show has to skip all over the place. I am actually pushing them to be more truthful about me. I've already said so much about my life. It would be silly for them to come up with a Mother Teresa.

Q: So what is "The Cher Show" all about then?

A: They focus a lot on the key men in my life: Sonny (Bono), Gregg (Allman), Robert (Camilletti). They talk about the films. About Sonny and me losing everything and then having to go out and work all these terrible places. About my leaving Sonny, Cool under pressure and dressed to the nines, Melora Hardin's magazine editor on Freeform's "The Bold Type" puts a human face on high-powered but unknowable figures such as Anna Wintour of Vogue.

As Jacqueline, Hardin's editor-in-chief knows who she is and what she values. She's willing to push her young charges to up their game, while remaining serenely confident when her authority is challenged from outside forces.

It's a character worlds away from the perpetually annoyed Jan Levinson, the boss she played on "The Office" for so many years.

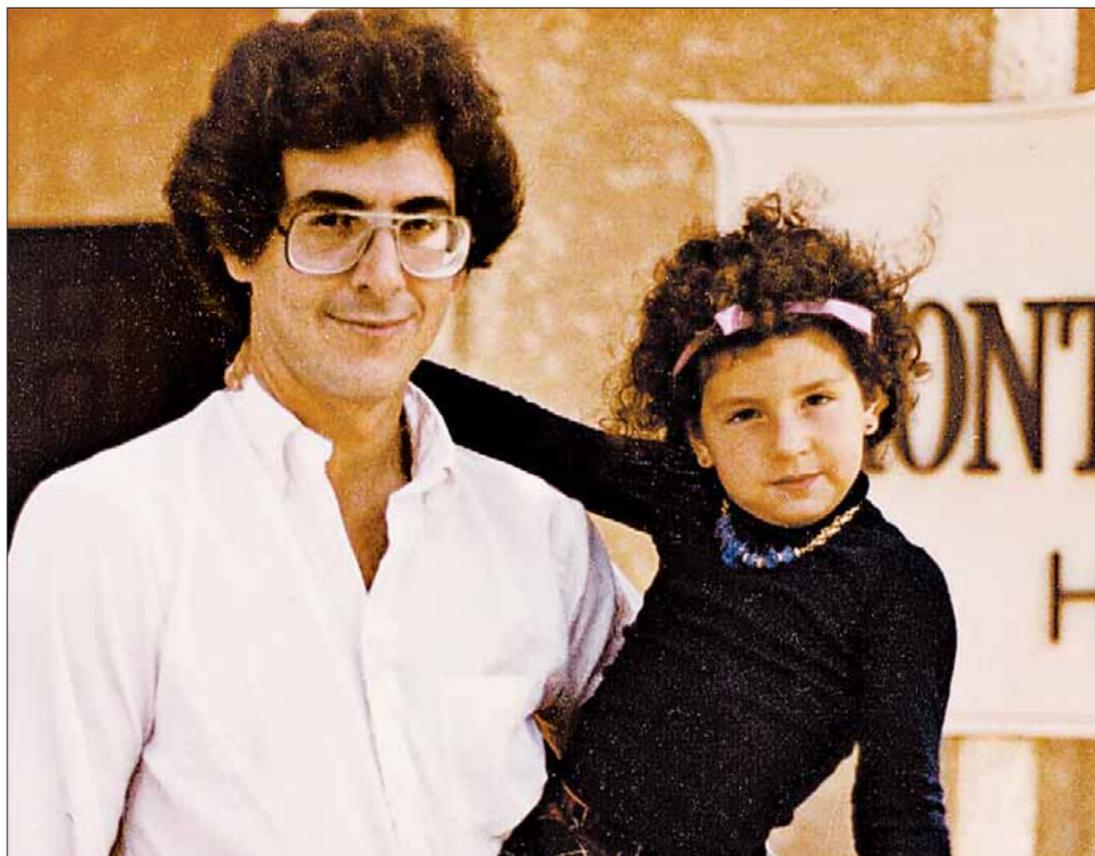

"I think I am kind of a natural leader, I think that's something that's true about me," Hardin said of being cast in these roles. "I think that Jacqueline is probably closer to me than Jan was, in the sense that I think I work pretty hard to be grounded and a more evolved person — Jan had fewer resources at her fingertips in Scranton, Pa., trying to climb that ladder in a man's world. And she had all those knuckleheads around her too."

When asked to recall a worst moment for this column, it was an experience auditioning for a certain well-known director that came to mind — and Hardin got to have the last word.

Woodstock, 60 miles northwest of Chicago, is a charming and seemingly timeless town, so there were some things about it that Violet Stiel recognized when she returned there after a quarter-century absence. She was a 14-year-old on her first visit and her last name was Ramis and she spent a chilly April week there watching her dad, Harold, direct that time-warping modern classic "Groundhog Day."

She was there June 10, the day after she appeared at the Tribune-sponsored Printer's Row Lit Fest, to talk about and, in the process, promote and sell her new book, "Ghostbuster's Daughter: Life with My Dad, Harold Ramis" (Blue Rider Press).

"Woodstock was just lovely," she said.

The townsfolk were happy to welcome her back. "It was an honor to have her here," says Arlene Lynes, the owner of the town's singular bookshop, Read Between the Lynes (www.readbetweentheynes.com). "For a few remarkable hours she was able to sit in the Harold Ramis Auditorium and answer questions and tell her memories of her father. R&B singer-songwriter Anita Baker accepts the Lifetime Achievement Award at Sunday's BET Awards.

Anita Baker shines at BET Awards

With big stars like Cardi B, Drake and Kendrick Lamar absent, the 2018 BET Awards barely handed out any trophies, but the show paid tribute to Anita Baker — and nearly brought her to tears.

Baker, an eight-time Grammy winner who dominated the R&B charts from the early '80s to mid-'90s, earned the Lifetime Achievement Award on Sunday at the Microsoft Theater in Los Angeles.

The 60-year-old used her speech to encourage the artists in the room to keep music alive.

"I would ask that the music be allowed to play, that singers are allowed to sing, and rappers are allowed to rap and poets are allowed to rhyme," said Baker, who also was honored by host Jamie Foxx, Ledisi and Marsha Ambrosius.

SZA, who was the most nominated woman at this year's Grammys, won best new artist.

After the show, BET announced that Kendrick Lamar had won best album for "Damn." and best male hip-hop artist. Beyonce won best female pop/R&B artist, while Bruno Mars was named the best male pop/R&B artist.

"Girls Trip" star and comedian Tiffany Haddish won best actress and gave her speech in a taped video.

DJ Khaled was the leading nominee with six and picked up the first award of the night — best collaboration — for "Wild Thoughts" with Rihanna and Bryson Tiller.

Migos won best group and gave a fun performance.

Teacher violates multiple boundaries

Dear Amy: My wife and I have been married for 12 years. We have three boys. My wife is a high school teacher. She teaches higher-level math, and we have always had her students over at our house for help outside of school.

I have always been supportive of this, but last year she had a student who didn't really need help come over. This student has a job and family in the same town, but he has basically moved in with us.

On top of that, my wife has been helping him start up a side business and has been working on jobs with him.

I am starting to get the feeling that something is up. He is never at the house when it's just me and the kids there but shows up after my wife gets home, and if my wife has to run to the grocery store, he goes with her.

We have a family vacation coming up and my wife invited him and a friend of his to go with us. I wasn't asked beforehand. Now it seems that because of the lack of space in the vacation house, I have been basically disinvented — it will be the kids, the two teens and my wife there.

I have tried to talk to her, but she doesn't seem to see where I am coming from. I don't think there is anything going on between the two of them, but I do feel like she enjoys his company more than mine.

Am I making too much of this?
— Very Frustrated

Dear Frustrated: You have a voice, and you need to use it. Stop trying to explain yourself, and start exerting your right to be a full partner in your marriage and family. That includes the right to call out outrageous behavior.

No teacher should conduct tutoring sessions at her home. No teacher should invite a student to live with her — unless the student is a foreign exchange student, and with permission of the school.

No partner and parent should start up a side business without her partner's full assent, or invite people on a family vacation and then maneuver to keep her husband at home.

The way you describe this scenario, your wife is violating all personal and professional boundaries. You should stop being so passive and confront her. Given what you describe, she is at risk of losing her job. And given the alarming implications of what you describe, she should not be working with young people.

Dear Amy: "David" and I have been friends for two years, and at times it seems he likes me more than as a friend, but then when I think our friendship might go down the romance path, we take a sharp turn away from that topic.

I have a hard time relating to people in general because of past trauma.

I do not trust people easily, nor do I care to be alone with guys, but when I am alone with him, I feel safe and comfortable.

Please help me figure out what I am feeling.
— Confused Girl

Dear Confused: It sounds like "David" is a very good friend and wants to stay that way. Maybe what you are feeling is a beautiful thawing of your frozen heart because you have a trustworthy male friend in your life.

When you start a romance with a person, you should be sure that your feelings are mutual. Because you're not sure, and from your letter it sounds like he isn't either, trying to rev up a friendship into a romantic relationship could get messy. It puts your treasured friendship at risk.

Allow yourself this gift: a male friend you can trust, whom you feel comfortable and safe around. Enjoy this healthy relationship, and let it help you to grow.

Dear Amy: Responding to a recent question from a mother-in-law, you wrote: "Frequently, it seems that young wives dictate the couple's social calendar, and so you should try to carve out some reasonable time with them — because this dynamic will only grow stronger if they decide to have children."

Emotional labor is a joint responsibility.

I would rewrite your comment to say, "Frequently, it seems that young husbands abdicate family responsibilities, leaving their wives to make all plans, and so you should impress on your son that it is his responsibility to stay in touch with you."

— Sally

Dear Sally: I completely agree with your rewrite. Thank you!

Hardin had a few words for Stone

significant role. I walked in, he looked at me, told me to start — and then he spent the entire time flipping through other people's photos. He didn't even look at me. And I remember thinking, 'What's the point? Why am I even here?' He had already made up his mind before I even started reading.

"I actually auditioned for him again for 'The Doors,' which was also humiliating, because the way he conducted it was really gross. It was the role that Meg Ryan ultimately ended up doing (as Jim Morrison's girlfriend) and the audition was for an orgasm scene. It was this whole sex scene in the bed where they're high and I was like, 'Really? Out of all the scenes, this is the one that you're going to have women do for an audition?'"

"So I really went for it, full of ecstasy. And I remember him saying, 'Yeah, that was good. Sit down, let's talk about this.' And then he directed everything to the guy (who was reading Morrison's lines), talking to him about his purpose and his motivation and didn't say anything to me. And then he wanted us to do it again. They already knew that they were going to cast Val Kilmer, so this guy was like a reader-actor guy who I'm sure was thrilled to just be in the room. But it all just felt disrespectful."

"Many years later, I saw (Stone) at a party. He's friends with a friend of mine and it was a quiet, small party, it wasn't like a big Hollywood party. And when she introduced me to him, he said, 'Oh, I don't think we've met.' And I said, 'We have met.' And he said, 'Oh. Was I nice to you or was I an a-----?' And I go, 'You were a total a-----.' And he blushed and he goes, 'Oh. Oh, I'm sorry.' And I said, 'You should be. You were a total a-----.' Both times."

(Melissa Gilbert has also talked about auditioning for "The Doors" and being asked to do a sex scene that was "humiliating and horrid.")

Did Hardin debate whether to answer Stone's question honestly?

"I just personally don't think you can ever make moves from fear or shame. You gotta be straightforward. And he was really, really quite rude both times. And in fact, not only rude — that audition for 'The Doors' was really gross.

"I just think he's so checked-out. He's a jerk. And he should know he's a jerk. Every single person I know who's read for him thinks he's a jerk! I just don't think it's OK to be such a jerk, I just don't."

"So yeah, I spoke up. I was already further along in my career at that point and I always kind of regretted that I wasn't able to say that to him when I was (auditioning) in the room. You know, slam my fists on the desk and say, 'You're being really rude! I'm trying to do a reading for you. If you're totally disinterested in me and you've already made up your mind, I'm just going to leave.' I always wished I had been able to do that."

"And that's one of the things that I love about Jacqueline (on 'The Bold Type') because she does those things in the moment. Sometimes in real life, you can't process things quite as quickly as your characters can. That's the genius of having writers that are working on these great, perfect moments for your character — you can't always do that for yourself.

"When you walk into an audition, you're there to do a job. And the job is to do the scene the best you can. That's your job — and their job is to assess whether this is the person they want to play this character. And that's the deal you make when you walk into an audition room. And when they don't do their part, you're kind of flummoxed and a little bit shocked and you do get thrown for a loop."

Did she have any concerns he might try to blackball her afterward?

"Oh God, no! I've been in the business since I was 6 years old. I did, like, every guest starring part on every show you could think of from the '70s, like 'Police Story' and 'Quincy' and 'The Love Boat' and all that stuff. And my point in bringing that up is, I have a lot of confidence about the way that I'm perceived. I've been in this business so long — if you want to call anybody in this town and ask, 'What's Melora Hardin like to work with?' there's nobody that's going to tell you that I'm a pain in the (rear) and that I'm a (jerk), because I'm just not, you know?"

"So I wasn't fearful about confronting Oliver Stone at a party. If he hadn't asked me that question, I can't say for sure if I would have said anything. But he asked it outright. And it would have been a lie to say, 'You were great!' And I'm not a liar. (Laughs) I may be some things but I'm not that! And he was kind of saying it in a flirtatious way, too. I don't know what he thought I was going to say! But I was like, 'Dude, you were a total jerk in every way.'"

"This is the thing: He wasn't mad and he wasn't upset that he was an a-----. He knew he was an a-----, that's why he asked the question! So it wasn't awkward between us. He just said, 'Oh God, I'm sorry! I need to work on that.' And that was it, the party continued. I was a grown woman at this point, I wasn't a newbie in the business. Also, I don't hold a grudge."

Would she audition for Stone again?

"Yeah, I'd go! If it was a part I wanted, of course I'd go! Because he makes good movies. (Laughs) I would totally go. And I would walk in the room and go, 'Hey, remember I met you at our friend's house and you asked me if you were nice or an a----- and I told you you were an a-----? OK great, now I'm going to do this scene for you.' (Laughs)

"But also, I'm in a different place than I was when I was 18. I'm a 50-year-old woman now and I have a lot of experience behind me and you can't do that to me anymore — because if you do, I'm walking out. I don't mind difficult people or people who are eccentrics — I like creative people and I'm OK with that, if there's a way for me to work with them. And if there's not, I'm totally fine not working with them. I'm totally fine just going, 'I'm out!' I've gotten to where I'm really good with that!"

"As I've gotten older and with maturity, I've realized that if you think something's happening, chances are it is happening. So if you think someone's a jerk, they probably are a jerk. If someone is coming at me with something that's feeling weird, then something's weird. And I don't even have to know what it is or get inside it, as I used to as a young woman. I used to have to figure it out. And now I'm like, 'Nah.' Because I know how I am with people. If someone is a jerk, they're a jerk. If they seem like they're shut down, they're shut down. If they seem like a bully, they're a bully. And I don't really have the time or the bandwidth to spend time on those people."

"So I'd walk into the room with Oliver Stone and see where he is now. Because everyone should have the opportunity to change and show up differently for you. If he shows up differently for me, then I want to be available to that. Maybe it would totally different. And maybe it would be exactly the same. And I'm open to either of those options."

The takeaway ...

"Stand up for yourself. It's OK to say, 'Hey dude, I'm here to do a job for you — if you don't want it, I can leave!' I've got a lot going on! I can go home and clean my freaking house! (Laughs) I don't need to be standing in front of you wasting my time."

RECORDINGS

'Bad Witch' compelling, if not vintage Nine Inch Nails

Chicago Tribune

Trent Reznor was doing just fine making acclaimed movie soundtracks when he resurrected Nine Inch Nails for the aptly named "Hesitation Marks" in 2013. Rather than relentlessly blowing out mainstream boundaries as NIN had done during much of its first incarnation, 1989-2008, "Hesitation Marks" came off as a relatively subdued sidestep.

Rather than quietly slipping out the exit, Reznor retooled NIN yet again, this time turning to Atticus Ross, his U.K. co-conspirator on the award-winning film projects "The Social Network" (2010) and "The Girl with the Dragon Tattoo" (2013). The Reznor-Ross version of NIN got busy in the last couple of years and churned out a trilogy of rapid-fire, under-31-minute recordings: "Not the Actual Events" (2016), "Add Violence" (2017) and now "Bad Witch."

"Bad Witch" is the most intriguing of the bunch. Though not an A-plus entry in the NIN catalog, it avoids the nostalgia trap that appeared to be closing around Reznor by coupling caustic punk attitude with an exploratory, genre-free approach.

It has its moments, especially when it sounds like it just doesn't care about alternative-rock chart position (take a bow, "Hesitation Marks"). Call it the blown-speaker effect. Much of "Bad Witch" sounds like it was made on defective equipment, sick with distortion and decay. And yet it's also creepily seductive, as subversive as the messed up, "Matrix"-like world it describes.

the ominous curtain of static, incongruous hand claps become audible — a pop song in disguise.

It slams into "Ahead of Ourselves," all hot drums and spastic bursts of noise, including the vocals. It surveys a wasteland: "When we could have done anything/we wound up building this."

Things destabilize from there. "Play the God-damned Part" drops sonic bombs over thudding bass, then wafts saxophone over an industrial swamp, peppered with what sounds like distorted thumb piano. "God Break Down the Door" is an agnostic's prayer over a frantic sax-and-drums electro-jazz blowout.

Less compelling are the closing exercises in atmospherics: the six-minute space ballad "I'm Not from this World" and the dirgy "Over and Out." Reznor and Ross would've been better off saving snippets of those tracks for their next movie project.

Marcus Lemonis offers business advice to entrepreneurs on "The Profit."

4 Chicago-area businesses to appear on Lemonis' 'Profit'

BY TRACY SWARTZ
Chicago Tribune

Four Chicago-area businesses are set to be featured on CNBC's "The Profit" in the second half of Season 5, which began airing this month.

Chicago entrepreneur and investor Marcus Lemonis visits 10 businesses around the country that could use some help. Ellison Eyewear, a designer glasses company based in the Near North Side community, is slated to be featured on the June 26 episode, while episodes devoted to Corey's NYC Bagel Deli, Hangout Lighting and Simply Slices will air later.

The local business owners each signed onto "The Profit" for different reasons, but they all seemed pleased with Lemonis' recommendations. "When 'The Profit' came to my door, I was ready for it. I won't say it was the easiest experience, but it was definitely well worth it," Ellison founder/CEO Aristotle Loumis told the Tribune.

Loumis launched his business in 2014. His Mediterranean-style glasses, which are handmade in Greece, are sold in Lemonis' retail stores. To celebrate the episode premiere, a "sip 'n' shop" event is set for noon to 5 p.m. Friday at the Marcus store, at 110 E. Delaware Place.

Hangout Lighting owner Jennifer Brown said she's been a fan of "The Profit" for years and thought a partnership with Lemonis would be a good fit. The West Town custom lighting company, which began as an Etsy venture, officially launched in 2013.

"The (show) experience was great, definitely a lot of drama at points, but in general, working with (Lemonis), he's super genuine and the same as what you see on TV," Brown said.

Lemonis' influence can already be seen at the River North location of Corey's NYC Bagel Deli, which underwent a makeover on the show. Owner Corey Kaplan said Lemonis encouraged him to add "Corey's" to the name of his long-running business — which used to be called NYC Bagel Deli — to honor his children, Corey and CorriAngel, who both died of polycystic kidney disease at a young age.

Kaplan also plans to open more locations and get into the wholesale bagel chip business using Lemonis' contacts.

"He might come off as a tough guy on TV, but he is really the nicest man ever," Kaplan said.

Simply Slices owner Dino Pavoni said he ended up on the show after trying out for ABC's "Shark Tank" a few times to pitch his drive-thru, pizza-by-the-slice business. He hoped Lemonis could help him franchise Simply Slices, which has locations in Burbank and Crestwood.

"It was a lot of reality, more reality than I expected, less business, but the experience was phenomenal," said Pavoni, whose family should be used to reality TV. His son, Derrick, competed on last week's episode of NBC's "American Ninja Warrior."

New episodes of "The Profit" air at 9 p.m. Tuesdays.

IN PERFORMANCE 'You Can't Take It With You' ★★★

Soothing respite in Oak Park

In leafy park, well-oiled apolitical comedy offers a break from headlines

By KERRY REID
Chicago Tribune

Is "You Can't Take It With You," that nuttiest of chestnuts in the classic American comedy canon, the play we need right now? Arguably, no. Given the current stakes for our democracy, George S. Kaufman and Moss Hart's message of "Don't Worry, Be Happy" seems downright irresponsible and certainly counter to the spirit of resistance.

Sure, it premiered in 1936, when the Great Depression was still holding too many Americans in the claws of economic despair, four years after Franklin Roosevelt told them that the only thing they had to fear was fear itself. But the Sycamore clan feels no such pain. The patriarch, Grandpa Martin Vanderhof (Jack Hickey), cashed out from his corporate job and has an annual income from "property" that nets him around $4,000 a year, or around $71,000 in today's terms. (And he's not paying income taxes on it — a potential fly in the ointment that — spoiler alert! — ends up being a nothingburger, plotwise.) They're eating cornflakes for dinner because they want to, not because they have to.

So yes, a play about a merry band of trustafarians thumbing their noses at the daily grind while they build fireworks in the basement, cook candy in the kitchen and follow various other creative pursuits with more exuberance than skill might set your teeth on edge. When Grandpa marvels that he used to worry about who was president, "but who cares now?," it's decidedly cringeworthy for anyone who hasn't been comatose for the last 18 months.

Yet Jason Gerace's production for Oak Park Festival Theatre could just as easily be held up as an object lesson on how to hold true to oneself even during dark days. If you're a fan of the play, this staging features some stellar performances that actually get a chance to breathe in the al fresco setting. We see the characters underneath the affectations and antics, and we get a sure sense of how the Sycamores have learned to lead by example through accepting each other's eccentricities and obsessions with love and support.

The story is simple: Alice Sycamore (Tyler Meredith), the one member of the family who has a 9-5 job, has fallen in love with the boss's son, Tony Kirby (Debo Balogun). Their engagement means that his stiff-necked parents will have to meet Alice's whimsical clan, which could scotch the entire affair, what with dad Paul (Scott Westerman) building explosives in his underwear, mom Penny (Barbara Zahora) inviting drunken actresses over to read her play, and sister Essie (Erica Bittner) still trying to nail down a pirouette after eight years of ballet lessons from Russian expat Boris Kolenkhov (Kent Joseph).

Will true love win the day? Will Grandpa find a way to get through to dyspeptic Mr. Kirby (Charls Sedgwick Hall) about the joy of achieving slack? Will you care?

If you're willing to shut out the noise of the daily news for a couple of hours (along with the occasional noise from the jets overhead), you might. In large part, this is because Balogun and Meredith bring a grounded but infectious joy to their burgeoning romance. They're seeking a middle way between the carefree Sycamores and the careworn Kirbys, and Balogun in particular shines as a young man figuring out that he can love his father without having to turn into him.

The physical comedy is on point — even when Bittner's extravagantly bad ballerina isn't. Joseph's outsize physique gets played for laughs, especially when he tries to get Hall's Mr. Kirby to wrestle. Hickey brings a touch of wistfulness to his aging bohemian, and Zahora's Penny is infectiously hospitable, even as she urges the Kirbys to unwind with a party game that reveals more than they anticipated.

Apolitical harmless anarchy of the Sycamore variety may not be the most helpful strategy these days. But if you need respite, there are worse ways to find it than in a leafy suburban park watching a well-oiled ensemble pay homage to a tale from a happier (if wholly mythical) past.

my moving to New York and going to Broadway in 1982. I think in some places it's really good, and I am the most critical person who ever drew breath. If they can impress me, they're doing good. The girls who play me have so much to do. The lady who plays my mom is great. That's a very important part. It starts the whole tenor of the project: How my mom treated me as a child. That is why I am how I am who I am now.

Q: You have three Chers in the show?

A: You can't have just one, right? Actually, they're often performing together. They sing and talk to each other. Babe (Micaela Diamond) is me when I met Sonny when I was 16. Lady (Teal Wicks) comes out with the TV show. Star (Stephanie J. Block) takes us to "Believe."

Q: Did you always want a Broadway show about your life?

A: I never thought that. Flody (Suarez) came to me with the idea. I met with a writer and I didn't like him at all, so that was terrible. Then when Jeffrey (Seller) became involved, it seemed a lot more real. Than I met with the writer, Rick (Elice) and I thought he was great. Now here we are.

Q: Did you find yourself this weekend wanting to get on stage?

A: Oh God, no. I still play this character in my concerts. So it's OK.

Q: And as you look out on your life in this show, what do you see?

A: I think it's a story of struggle. I was resilient. There were no other options for me. There was nothing else for me to do. I had to put my big-girl G-string on and go for it. From the time I was little, it was never easy for me.

Q: You were spotted at the Oriental Theatre this weekend. How was that?

A: I came in and unfortunately the lights were not yet down. I seemed to stand out.

Q: Do you still like meeting your people?

A: Yes, but it depends on who the people are and how they saying what they are saying. In this age of the selfie, I get my picture stolen a lot. I won't say taken. And I always want people to be polite and respectful of my space. And it all depends on how I am feeling. In the early days, people were much nicer, and if they still are nice now, I can be talked into things.

Q: Which were the hardest parts of the show to watch?

A: The fights. The breakups. The people who are lost. Everything that was hard in real life. You can imagine. But I really love it when all the girls are together. In art you are talented or you're not, so people are either talented or they're not, and these people are all really talented. And those songs are hard.

Q: You get to be back in Chicago on a beautiful weekend.

A: I played Chicago so many times on my "farewell tour" that it became really embarrassing. "But it's the same show." I'd keep saying. But people still kept coming.

Now in previews at the Oriental Theatre, 24 W. Randolph St., "The Cher Show" opens Thursday and plays through July 15. For tickets or more details, visit www.broadwayinchicago.com.

Daughter details life with Ramis

for the hospitable welcome he and the crew received during the filming of 'Groundhog Day' (in 1992). Of course Violet's visit wouldn't have been complete without a drink to world peace at Public House of Woodstock, which we managed to squeeze in.

This is Violet Ramis Stiel's first book, after a career spent as a teacher and social worker.

She calls the writing of it "an all-consuming experience." It is an honest book and deeply personal.

It was born more than a decade ago when she and her father began to collaborate on a book about parenting. "I had two young children and he had two teenage sons and we started talking about the trials and tribulations of being parents. I had, let's say, a pretty unconventional childhood, so we started writing. Our approach was what we called 'existential parenting.'"

The project halted when her father became ill with vasculitis, a rare disease that involves swelling of the blood vessels. But after his death, she began to realize, she says, "that my dad left a lot of himself behind and I became determined to gather my memories with the lessons that he gave me and that became the motivation for this book."

You can certainly grasp that in the letter dated Aug. 15, 2014, six months after her father's death. It is at the beginning of the book and is written to her father. Part of it reads, "On top of missing you like crazy, I'm also feeling a lot of anxiety about loss. I already lost you and now I'm afraid I'm going to lose all of the 'you' that's such a huge part of me. I mean, if you're not here, then who am I? How can I preserve what we had when I'm alone? I don't want to forget a single thing about you. ... It's all I have now."

The book gained a great deal of pre-publication attention in April when it was learned that it revealed, for the first time, that her dad, while separated from her mother, Ann Plotkin, and before his marriage to Erica Mann (they would have two sons), fathered a child with director Amy Heckerling ("Fast Times at Ridgemont High") in 1977.

Violet knew about her sister long before her father told her. Eventually they met, and it's nice to report that she and Mollie Heckerling are pals, in part because, Stiel writes, "Our mutual admiration for each other ('You're amazing!' 'No, you're amazing!') allowed us to get close without it ever feeling competitive."

She charmed the folks in Woodstock with such stories from the book. That's understandable. She's charming and Woodstock has celebrated her dad and his movie with ever-increasing energy, especially during Groundhog Days (www.woodstockgroundhog.org), an annual event that fills a week with walking tours, trivia contests, movie showings and, of course, a real groundhog searching for its shadow. There are also engraved metal plaques all over town, signifying notable scenes from the film.

Stiel says "Groundhog Day" was "probably the most widely loved and respected film of my father's career." But it casts some dark shadows too because this was the film that fractured the fruitful and close friendship between her father and Bill Murray, who happens to be Violet's Godfather.

She elaborates in print: "(Bill) and my dad were not seeing eye to eye on the tone of the film. They had a few arguments on set, including one in which my dad uncharacteristically lost his temper, grabbed Bill by the collar, and shoved him up against a wall. Eventually, Bill just completely shut my dad out ... for the next 20-plus years."

This hurt and confused Ramis, but there was a slight reconciliation. Stiel writes: "In classic Bill fashion, he showed up at the house, unannounced, at seven a.m., with a police escort and a dozen doughnuts. My dad wasn't able to talk much at that point, so they didn't get to the nitty-gritty of what happened or go back and rehash any of the old stuff, but they spent a couple of hours together, laughed a little, and made their peace."

The book contains many personal letters and emails. You'll read Violet's takes on her father's films as actor/director/writer: The great ones ("GD," "Animal House," "Caddyshack," "Ghostbusters") as well as those not so ("Year One"), but the majority of the book's pages are filled satisfactorily with father-daughter tales. Her affection peppers every page and her father emerges from them as a complicated though much-loved man. She sees his life through her eyes, and it's a delightful and insightful perspective.

Though Stiel is loath to refer to her book as a "conventional biography," it does a fine job of charting her father's life, from its humble if nurturing Chicago roots through and to ... well, you know where. It can be sad but mostly it is fun and frank. "My dad smoked.

A lot. Vantage 100s by the carton, and pot, pretty much by the pound, throughout my early childhood," she writes. "Say what you will about irresponsible parenting, but I think smoking grass helped him be the infinitely patient, playful and peaceful dad he was."

It can easily be argued that the Ramis' experiences in Woodstock with "GD" reminded him of his Midwestern roots, for he moved back to the Chicago area in 1996 and this is where he remained. Violet was a frequent visitor and she tells, riotously, of one trip in 2005.

After a day visiting Lincoln Park Zoo and Navy Pier, they walked into the Cheesecake Factory. "It was crowded and the host told us we'd have to wait at least an hour," she writes. "My dad was (angry). ... He loved to be recognized."

She told him, "Let's just wait, Dad. It's fine. It's the f----- Cheesecake Factory."

"I care," he snapped. "If they don't know who I am, they're idiots. If they do know who I am and don't care they're a-----."

Stiel, who lives in Manhattan with her husband and their three children, still misses her dad. She will tell you that "Perhaps the simplest and most useful thing my father ever taught me was this: Life is messy."

Of that mess, she has created something of a marvel.

WATCH THIS: TUESDAY

Derek Hough

"World of Dance" (9 p.m., NBC): "The Qualifiers" enter their fifth round in this new episode as judges Jennifer Lopez, Derek Hough and Ne-Yo continue to gauge the contenders who have come from around the world to vie for this competition's $1 million grand prize. Jenna Dewan also remains on hand as both the show's host and a mentor to the dancers.

"America's Got Talent" (7 p.m., NBC): The fifth round of auditions for the season fuels this new episode, with judges Mel B, Simon Cowell, Heidi Klum and Howie Mandel continuing to survey hopefuls with a wide range of skills. Having happened already since the show returned, the Golden Buzzer — which sends someone directly to the finals — is a definite possibility for performers who are particularly impressive. Tyra Banks is the host.

"Beat Shazam" (7 p.m., FOX): Singing star Ginuwine is the guest who turns up to inspire the players in this new episode. His music is likely to factor into the game, in which contestants who are couples have to identify songs correctly to win the competition — and then get the chance to collect as much as $1 million by going up against the music app Shazam. Host Jamie Foxx also is joined by his daughter Corinne, who serves as the show's disc jockey.

"blackish" (8 p.m., ABC): Anyone who's had postpartum depression will relate to Bow's (Tracee Ellis Ross) plight in "Mother Nature." As she struggles to get through it, Dre (Anthony Anderson) does what he can to help, while also advising her to seek professional counsel. Laurence Fishburne also stars. Another episode follows.

"Humans" (9 p.m., AMC): Agnes's (Holly Earl) seething anger threatens to compromise any chance of a successful outcome as Laura (Katherine Parkinson) leads an already tense visit by the Dryden Commission to the Shipyard in the new "Episode 4." Elsewhere, Mia (Gemma Chan) is forced to confront her past actions when she runs into Ed (Sam Palladio), and a night out ends in tragedy.

"Love Is..." (9 p.m., OWN): After he and Nuri (Michele Weaver) confess their love to each other, Yasir (Will Catlett) reaches an important decision in a new episode called "First Date." Later, Nuri is bound and determined to meet Yuri at a concert, but that could mean jeopardizing her work situation, since she'll have to give priority to the date instead of any office responsibilities.

Today's birthday (June 26): Listen to your heart this year. Strategize for long-term growth with your partner. Adapt to a community surprise. A summer spotlight illuminates you before changes with family accounts encourage a rise in your own income. A winter partnership blossoms.

Aries (March 21-April 19): Today is a 6. Revisions are necessary in a group project over a month, with Mars retrograde. Tweak and polish. Follow through on what you said. Simplify matters. Untangle miscommunications.

Taurus (April 20-May 20): 7. With Mars retrograde, keep professional promises this month. Launch new projects when Mars goes direct in a month. Complete existing jobs. Mechanical breakdowns could cause expensive delays.

Gemini (May 21-June 20): 7. Stay close to home and complete educational projects over the next month, with Mars retrograde. Don't move too fast. Postpone travel. Do the homework.

Cancer (June 21-July 22): 6. Stick with what you know works. Complete existing projects, with Mars retrograde. Wait a month on big transactions. Restore supplies, and recharge batteries.

Leo (July 23-Aug. 22): 7. Keep your temper with your partner this month. The one who begins a fight loses it, with Mars retrograde. Gentleness wins over aggression.

Virgo (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): 7. Recuperate forces over the next month, with Mars retrograde. Nurture your physical health, fitness and work. Prepare and practice for later performance.

Libra (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): 6. Don't force a square peg into a round hole. Make fun plans with your sweetheart and family for next month, after Mars goes direct. Relax.

Scorpio (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): 6. Plan domestic improvements in detail. Prepare budgets with multiple bids. Launch into action, after Mars stations direct in a month. Prepare well.

Sagittarius (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): 6. Expect traffic delays. The next month, with Mars retrograde, favors editing words already written. Don't launch new communications projects yet. Refine and polish your message.

Capricorn (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): 7. Review financial plans, with Mars retrograde. Wait a month for big purchases. Fine-tune budgets, and keep accounts current.

Aquarius (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): 8. Over the next 10 weeks, with Mars retrograde in your sign, revise personal goals. Focus on completing current projects before getting into new ones.

Pisces (Feb. 19-March 20): 5. Put down roots, with Mars retrograde. Plan your moves for action after Mars goes direct in a month. Make backup plans. Think and strategize.

Twins Justin and Jason Hackett, North and South, respectively, in today's deal, are the sons of Paul Hackett, a respected British professional. The sons have a reputation as very aggressive bidders, and the final contract on this deal would not win any beauty prizes. Just because a contract is hopeless, however, is no reason to go down.

The opening spade lead went to the queen and king, and Jason led the 10 of hearts, ducking in dummy when West covered. All of the other suits were dangerous to lead, so West led his low heart. Jason inserted dummy's nine and ran three more heart tricks. He discarded four clubs from his hand while East shed a spade and West a spade and a club. Jason was pretty sure the queen of diamonds was in the West hand, but there was nothing he could do about it while in dummy. He led a club to his 10 and West's jack.

West could cash his ace of clubs, but then had to lead either a spade or a diamond. He chose to lead a diamond, which ended the issue right there, giving South four diamond tricks. Had West elected to play the ace and another spade instead, Jason would have been in his hand with the jack of spades and he was prepared to take the "backwards" finesse in diamonds. He would have led the jack of diamonds, and assuming West covered, he would have won in dummy and led a diamond back to his nine. Well played!

TUESDAY, JUNE 26

NORMAL HIGH: 83° NORMAL LOW: 62° RECORD HIGH: 99° (1983) RECORD LOW: 50° (1992)

Expect higher temperatures, thunderstorms

LOCAL FORECAST

HIGH 82 LOW 70

- Widespread cloudiness dominates, but some sun possible. Early morning shower can't be ruled out in some areas.
- Warmer, more humid air creates an unstable atmosphere capable of strong/severe t-storms along with locally heavy downpours.
- Highs range from mid to upper 70s lakeside areas to middle 80s at some warmer S/SW suburbs.
- SE-S winds 10-20 mph.
- Cloudy, warm and humid with clusters of t-storms Tuesday night. Some storms capable of damaging winds, large hail and heavy downpours.

NATIONAL FORECAST

Hot temperatures are heading to Chicago, along with periods of showers and thunderstorms primarily as the warmup gets under way. A major weather change in shaping up for the Midwest and Chicago. Afternoon high temperatures will climb into the lower 80s Tuesday and Wednesday, then reach about 90 degrees Thursday and into the mid- or upper 90s Friday and Saturday.

A weak weather disturbance brings a good chance of thunderstorms Tuesday into Wednesday, but it moves east by later Wednesday, and only a slight chance of storms is in the picture for the remainder of the week. Slightly cooler temperatures will follow by late Sunday and into Monday, the combined influence of more cloudiness, an increasing chance of thunderstorms and the approach of a weak cold front Monday.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 27

HIGH 81 LOW 65

Clouds, possible early morning shower or t-storm. Rain moves east leaving skies partly sunny later. W-NW winds bring a drop in humidity. Temps peak near 80. Fair, pleasant at night.

THURSDAY, JUNE 28

HIGH 90 LOW 73

Heat dome builds across the central U.S. A mix of sun and clouds, warm with highs near 90. An isolated t-storm possible at night as humidity levels surge. Winds become SW at 10-15 mph.

FRIDAY, JUNE 29

HIGH 97 LOW 78

Chance of a morning t-storm. Turning hot and humid. Afternoon temp soar to the middle to upper 90s, with peak heat indexes around 100 degrees. Breezy, warm and muggy overnight.

SATURDAY, JUNE 30

HIGH 97 LOW 80

Second day of intense heat under mostly sunny skies. Highs reach the middle to upper 90s, with heat index into triple digits. SW winds 15 to 20 mph. Some clouds at night with lows near 80.

SUNDAY, JULY 1

HIGH 94 LOW 74

Sunshine through cumulus clouds. Continued hot and humid with peak area heat indexes 100-105. Slight chance of a t-storm late, better chance at night. SW winds 10-20 mph.

MONDAY, JULY 2

HIGH 87 LOW 71

Not as hot due to extensive cloudiness but remaining humid. Clusters of showers and thunderstorms, gradually settling south in the afternoon/evening.

ASK TOM

Dear Tom,
It is my understanding that a tornado can actually "hop" over things so that one place may be damaged but a place right next to it may not be.
— Karen Butler

Dear Karen,
This is a popular belief, but it is not true. Tornadoes can vary in intensity over very short distances, causing damage in one spot, weakening and doing no damage, then intensifying again, and so on.

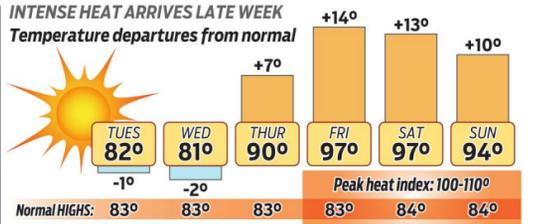

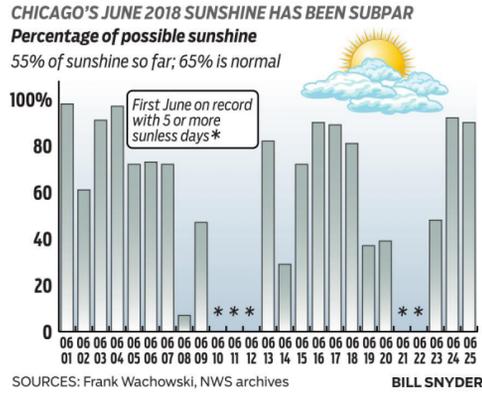

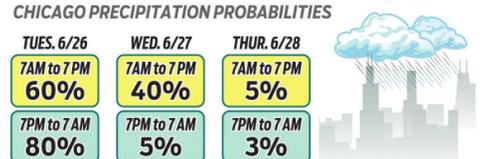

In addition, many tornadoes contain much smaller (diameters of 40 feet or less) but more violent vortexes within the larger tornado circulation. These vortexes produce narrow paths of extreme destruction within the larger tornado.

Finally, multiple tornadoes sometimes occur with short separation, but those occurrences are erroneously classified as a single tornado.
