After the chaos, searches begin

Fireworks viewers return to Navy Pier for items lost as they fled

BY MARIE FAZIO, ALICE YIN AND ALEJANDRO SERRANO

The woman was among dozens of people on Friday searching for lost items at Navy Pier in the aftermath of a chaotic end to Chicago's annual fireworks show.

On the verge of tears, she explained to staffers at the pier's lost-and-found that she was scheduled to fly to New York and needed the identification she had lost Thursday night when word of an active shooter spread through crowds pouring out of the pier's Fourth of July celebration, causing panic and pandemonium.

Witnesses said cries from young children pierced the air. Parents desperately searched for lost children. Hostesses in a nearby restaurant hid under tables. Some people even tried to hide in a freezer and storage area at the restaurant, according to two servers who work there.

"It was pure chaos," said Rachel Schar, a 22-year-old who works at Harry Caray's Tavern, where fleeing crowds stormed to in the confusion. "I literally thought I was going to die."

At a news conference Friday, police officials said a fight between at least two individuals shortly after 10 p.m. led to a young man pulling a knife and stabbing three people near a McDonald's outside of Navy Pier.

At about the same time that crowds shuffled out of Navy Pier following the fireworks display, police received unconfirmed reports that someone had lit a firework in a group of people.

Amid the commotion, private security officers assigned to the event signaled a possible active shooter threat and began telling the crowd to take shelter, inciting

Chicagoans step in as experts debate what's best for the butterfly species

BY CHRISTEN A. JOHNSON

Karen Hallman and her husband were walking their dog through the woods a few years ago when they noticed they were surrounded by countless milkweed pods.

Hallman, an avid gardener who's maintained a mostly Illinois native garden for 19 years at her Portage Park home, knew the plant attracted the ever-majestic monarch butterfly but didn't think much would happen if she sprinkled the pods throughout her yard.

"But they grew," she said, "and once they establish themselves, they grow like crazy." It took three to four years for the milkweed to become a permanent fixture in Hallman's garden, and after it did, the butterflies started coming, laying eggs, finding food and pollinating.

Hallman liked the smell of the milkweed blooms, and "I was happy (the butterflies and caterpillars) were out in the yard, but that was kind of as far as it went for me," she said. However, as more butterflies started coming to her garden and laying eggs on the milkweed plants, Hallman's interest grew, and she did some research.

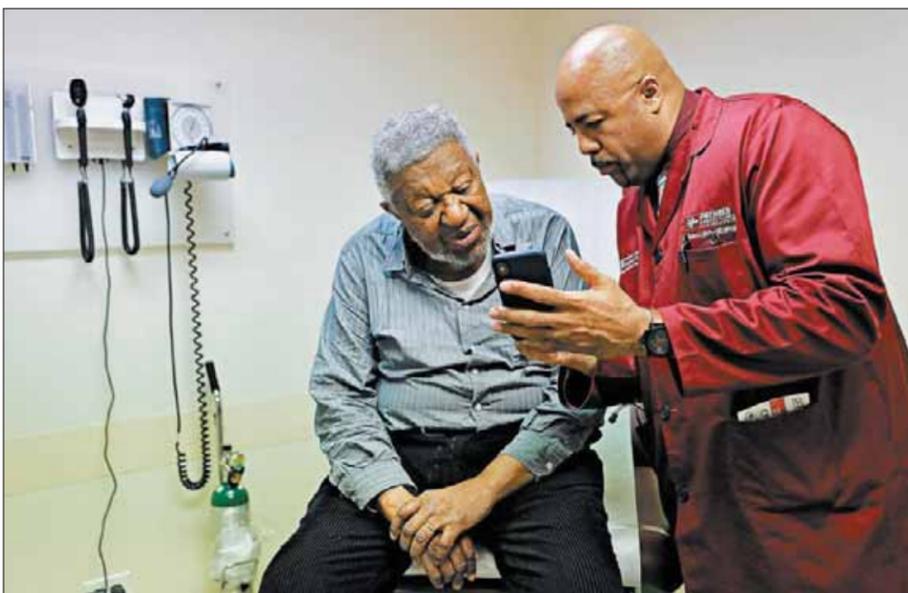

Last summer, Hallman began raising monarch butterflies, a growing trend that has caused debate between the academic science community and nature enthusiasts.

Through her teaching background, Hallman knew that it wasn't uncommon

New black-owned urgent care fills void on South Side

BY DARCEL ROCKETT

Dr. Airron Richardson's patient had waited hours in the ER with a piece of hearing aid stuck in her ear canal.

She finally walked into Richardson's practice, where he removed the fragment in 10 minutes — a benefit of having an urgent care in the neighborhood.

South Side residents lacked such a facility until recently, according to the trio of black physicians who founded Premier Urgent Care & Occupational Health Center. Richardson along with Dr. Michael McGee (an emergency doctor) and Dr. Reuben Rutland (trauma surgeon) believe the facility is the first black-owned urgent care in the city. It opened in October 2018 at 1301 E. 47th St. and celebrated a grand opening June 15.

"Starting a business, you always want to make money, but you have to do things for the right reason to get your blessing on the other side," McGee said. "For us,

Justice's job: Justify citizenship question

Trump pushes DOJ, weighs executive order

BY TARA BHRAMPUR AND JOHN WAGNER
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department affirmed Friday that it still is pursuing a path for adding a citizenship question to the 2020 census, according to a filing in federal court in Maryland.

The filing followed statements earlier in the day from President Donald Trump in which he said he is "thinking of" issuing an executive order to add the controversial question.

Government lawyers said in their filing Friday that the Justice and Commerce departments had been "instructed to examine whether there is a path forward" for the question and that if one was found they would file a motion in the Supreme Court to try to get the question on the survey to be sent to every U.S. household.

Attorneys for the government and challengers to the addition of the question had faced a 2 p.m. deadline Friday set by U.S. District Judge George J. Hazel to lay out their plans so he could decide whether to proceed with a case before him probing whether the government has discriminatory intent in wanting to ask about citizenship.

Hazel said that the case will proceed, scheduling information-gathering to begin now and conclude by Aug. 19, with any witnesses to testify in September.

The government has begun printing the census forms without the question, and that process will continue, administration officials said.

Justice Department lawyers had argued in Friday's filing that a "stampede-like" scenario, said Chief of Patrol Fred Waller. At least 17 people were injured, and 31 juveniles were arrested on disorderly conduct-related charges, police said.

"I was there personally, and I can tell you things were very chaotic," Waller told reporters. "In the end, there was never an active shooter, and no one was shot."

Police Superintendent Eddie Johnson was reluctant to criticize the private security guards for apparently sparking the chaotic scene, saying, "We want to err on the side of caution." He said he planned to talk with them.

Johnson said police had the proper resources and protocols in place when the incident unfolded Thursday night. Everyone who entered Navy Pier had gone through security, he noted.

"Of course, we cannot control someone popping a firecracker off in a large group of people," he told reporters. "That's something that we simply can't control. But what we know is we always have to have the proper communication."

The fight that led to the stabbing broke out among a group of males after some of them flashed gang signs around 10:10 p.m. in the 600 block of East Grand Avenue, police said. A 14-year-old boy was stabbed in the arm and rib, and another 14-year-old boy was stabbed in the armpit. They were both taken to Lurie Children's Hospital, where they were stabilized.

Using the many cameras in the area, detectives "have very good leads" about the identity of the attacker, according to police spokesman Anthony Guglielmi.

Schar's co-worker Ashley Calvillo said the restaurant was wrecked into a jumble of toppled furniture and silverware by the crush of people who fled the restaurant to escape the threat of an active shooter.

More than a dozen pairs of shoes in all sizes were left on the floor. Some patrons even left their strollers in the mad rush to leave.

On Friday, emotions were running high as streams of people returned to the pier to look for items they had lost. One man returned to pick up a stroller he had left behind Thursday night as he grabbed his baby and ran to hide underneath a table at Giordano's, another restaurant on the pier.

In a statement, Navy Pier officials called the incident a "tragic event" and said they are working with Chi-ago police "to ensure that we are doing all that we can to keep people safe while they are visiting the Pier."

"Our hearts go out to all who were affected, and we send our thoughts and prayers to those recovering," the statement said.

Angela Lewis, of Crown Point, Indiana, and Antwine Johnson, of Indianapolis, were visiting Chicago with family to see the fireworks. Amid the chaos, they lost a cellphone.

The panicked family scattered when they saw the stampede and heard people warning of a shooting.

"We all got separated," Lewis said. "I didn't hear any gunshots. I don't even know what happened, but I was more concerned about the stampede of people running all over each other, even if there wasn't a shooter."

Johnson picked up his three little cousins — a 3-year-old and 6-year-old twins — and ran into a nearby restaurant. They couldn't get into the kitchen, so they knocked on the door of a locked bathroom door.

"My mom started yelling, 'We have babies, we have babies,' and they let us in," he said.

Johnson estimated 15 people, including an infant, hid in the single-stall bathroom. After a short period of time, a second wave of people tried to enter the bathroom.

"People started knocking on the door, yelling names, trying to find people," Johnson said. "Everyone was like, 'Don't open the door! Don't open the door!'"

Lewis said she felt safe entering Navy Pier on the Fourth because of the tight security — all bags were checked on entry and guests scanned with a metal detector wand.

But after the incident, she said, she won't return for crowded events like the fireworks show or Taste of Chicago.

"We thought, 'Nothing's ever happened here,'" Lewis said as she looked for the cellphone Friday. "Even though we knew there'd be a lot of people, we thought it would be OK."

Richard and Demetra Lowe, from Tulsa, Oklahoma, were visiting Chicago with their daughter, Carly. The family ate dinner at Harry Caray's and had just left when a "roaring crowd" began running toward them from behind.

"We were trying to run," Carly said. "We finally figured out that it was probably just mass hysteria."

Despite the previous night's violence, they returned to Navy Pier on Friday morning to ride the Seadog boat cruise.

Census

there was no need to start producing information since for now courts have barred the government from adding the question.

The Maryland case poses the issue of whether the addition of the citizenship question would violate equal-protection guarantees and whether it is part of a conspiracy to drive down the count of minorities.

Statements Friday from Trump and his acting U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services director, Ken Cuccinelli, seemed to add confusion to the government's previously stated rationale for the addition.

The administration had said in multiple legal battles that the question was needed to get a better sense of the voting population to help enforce the Voting Rights Act. Opponents said the question could result in a severe undercount of immigrant communities.

Speaking to reporters Friday at the White House, Trump said the question was needed "for many reasons."

"No. 1, you need it for Congress — you need it for Congress for districting," he said. "You need it for appropriations — where are the funds going? How many people are there? Are they citizens? Are they not citizens? You need it for many reasons."

Trump's statement could give additional heft to evidence discovered in May suggesting the administration worked with a Republican redistricting strategist who saw the question as a way to give Republicans and non-Hispanic whites an electoral advantage. Government officials had previously denied that adding the question had anything to do with the strategist or his analysis.

Appearing on Fox News Business, Cuccinelli listed justifications for the question: "Frankly, as part of the ongoing debate over how we deal financially and legally with the burden of those who are not here legally," Cuccinelli said, listing the justifications for the census question. "That is a relevant issue."

President Donald Trump talks to reporters Friday at the White House before leaving for his Bedminster, N.J., golf club.

Trump had raised the possibility that some kind of addendum could be printed separately after further litigation of the issue, a move that would almost certainly carry additional costs and may not be feasible, according to census experts.

"We'll see what happens," Trump said. "We could start the printing now and maybe do an addendum after we get a positive decision. So we're working on a lot of things, including an executive order."

Census experts say that, among other concerns, such an addendum would likely violate the bureau's strict rules on testing a question, which include considering how the placement of a question on the form affects respondents' likelihood of filling it out.

Trump's comments came as government lawyers scrambled to find a legal path to carry out the president's wishes despite their conclusions in recent days that no such avenue exists.

Census officials and lawyers at the Justice and Commerce departments scrapped holiday plans and spent Independence Day seeking new legal rationales for a citizenship question.

"It's kind of shocking that they still don't know what they're doing," said Thomas Saenz, president and general counsel of the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, which is representing some of the plaintiffs in the case in Maryland.

In the Supreme Court's splintered ruling last week, Chief Justice John Roberts said the government had provided a "contrived" reason for wanting the information, seemingly leaving open the door for the government to offer a new justification and see whether it satisfies the court. An executive order from Trump and a new rationale given by Commerce Secretary Wilbur Ross on the basis of that order could give the administration something to take back to the justices.

But "executive orders do not override decisions of the Supreme Court," Saenz said. "Separation of powers remains, as it has been for over 200 years, a critical part of our constitutional scheme."

Lightfoot: Annual financial audit shows 'extraordinary' challenges

BY GREGORY PRATT

Mayor Lori Lightfoot acknowledged the city faces looming budget woes because of ballooning public pension costs and other growing expenses as officials on Friday released Chicago's annual financial audit.

City Hall released the city's comprehensive financial report, which said that Chicago's general fund balance — which pays for day-to-day city expenses such as police and fire, garbage hauling, and part of the city's public employee pension payments, among other things — grew from $288 million in 2017 to $332 million for a surplus of $44 million to end 2018.

Officials attributed the growth to "the improving economy, enhancements in revenue systems, and ongoing expense reductions and savings."

But the financial report, which reviewed the 2018 fiscal year, is largely silent on Chicago's next budget, which is expected to present a big shortfall. In a letter accompanying the city's audit, Lightfoot addressed Chicago's budget woes.

"It is no secret that our city faces extraordinary financial challenges, driven by a legacy of pension liabilities, mounting personnel contract increases, and growing debt service obligations — all of which have been long in the making," Lightfoot said. "While these costs loom large for next year and beyond, our administration will be looking at how city government functions to develop a sustainable road map for the future."

Lightfoot took office in May facing a gaping budget hole in the next fiscal year, the first citywide spending plan she'll have to propose and push through the City Council.

It had been expected that when Lightfoot took office and prepared her 2020 budget, she would have to come up with a combined $528 million in tax increases and budget cuts. But in May, officials in then-Mayor Rahm Emanuel's administration said the shortfall would be worse because of costs previously covered with expensive borrowing practices and the city's pension investments poor performance at the end of 2018 as the stock market took a dive.

Lightfoot has previously disputed the Emanuel administration's $700 million budget hole estimate, saying, "It's worse than that." Her administration, however, has not yet offered its own estimate.

After the City Council met last month, Lightfoot said residents will need to pay more to plug its next budget shortfall, though she didn't offer specifics.

"There's no question we're going to have to come to the taxpayers and ask for additional revenue," Lightfoot said.

Though Lightfoot's administration has not yet offered specifics on next year's budget plan, the police annual financial report shows that the police pension payments alone will increase by about $148 million, and its unfunded liability grew by $75.7 million to $10.4 billion in 2018.

The city's lack of exact projections for next year's budget hasn't stopped insiders and other political leaders from speculating on the total. Cook County Board President Toni Preckwinkle, who lost to Lightfoot in the mayoral race, recently commented on the city's budget in a Sun-Times report, saying she's heard the deficit will be closer to $1.4 billion.

Asked about Preckwinkle's comment at a separate news conference, Lightfoot responded, "So, Toni Preckwinkle now knows about the city of Chicago finances? Good for her."

Man gets 50 years for killing 'friend'

2015 shooting at Schiller Park motel a 'calculated execution,' prosecutors say

BY GEORGE HOUDE

A 24-year-old Texas man convicted of killing a friend in what prosecutors described as an execution-style murder committed over a dispute involving a male massage business was sentenced to 50 years in prison by a Cook County judge this week.

Anthony Mrdjenovich also was ordered by Judge Marc Martin on Wednesday to pay restitution of $7,800 to cover the unpaid funeral expenses for Philip Scheau in spite of objections from defense lawyers.

Scheau, a Marine Corps veteran from Des Plaines and someone Mrdjenovich described as a "best friend," was shot to death at a Schiller Park motel in February 2015. The 24-year-old Scheau had been honorably discharged from the Marines a month earlier.

His mother, Eva Scheau, testified at the sentencing hearing that the death of her son caused "unimaginable pain."

"A day does not go by that I do not think of him and how his future was taken away," she said.

Mrdjenovich, who testified in his own defense at trial and recanted a videotaped confession he gave to Schiller Park police detectives, continued to insist that he didn't kill Scheau.

"I maintain my innocence," Mrdjenovich said when asked by Martin if he wanted to address the court. "I have nothing to say."

He was found guilty of murder by a jury in March.

His defense team, Assistant Public Defenders Caroline Glennon and Dan Naranjo, maintained that Scheau was shot by another man and that Mrdjenovich's confession to police was made out of fear.

Prosecutors said Mrdjenovich and Scheau both worked for a national male massage business run by a Texas man named Timothy Dorsey, who currently is in federal custody on sex trafficking charges, authorities said.

When Scheau started his own business in Chicago, Dorsey and Mrdjenovich drove from Texas in a retaliation plot, prosecutors said. Mrdjenovich ambushed Scheau at the motel and shot him three times including a fatal shot to the head, prosecutors said.

During the trial, Assistant State's Attorney Ethan Holland said Scheau's death was "a cold, calculated execution."

Testimony from a detective sergeant in Palestine, Texas, on Wednesday revealed that Mrdjenovich started serving a 10-year suspended sentence in that state for a 2013 armed robbery in which a store owner was shot in the face.

A 17-year-old high school student at the time, Mrdjenovich drove the getaway car and provided a .22-caliber rifle used in the robbery, Sgt. David Kassaw testified. Mrdjenovich was on probation in the case when Scheau was killed, he said.

Martin said he took into consideration arguments by Glennon describing Mrdjenovich as someone with intellectual disabilities and mental health problems. She told Martin that her client was under the control of Dorsey, who provided the handgun for Scheau's murder.

She also argued that Mrdjenovich should not have to pay Scheau's funeral expenses since he is destitute.

Mrdjenovich was facing a minimum of 45 years in prison for a murder committed with a firearm and a maximum of life behind bars.

In handing down his sentence, Martin said Mrdjenovich had taken a violent path.

"At a fairly young age, Mr. Mrdjenovich has been convicted of two offenses involving shootings," Martin said. "I cannot conceive that future criminal activity is outside consideration in this case."

Mrdjenovich has been in custody since his arrest in December 2015.

EVA MOZES KOR
1934-2019

KYLE TELECHAN/POST-TRIBUNE 2018

Holocaust survivor Eva Mozes Kor recounts her experiences at Auschwitz-Birkenau concentration camp at Valparaiso University last November.

Holocaust survivor remembered for her message of forgiveness

BY AMY LAVALLEY

Eva Mozes Kor, a Holocaust survivor who brought her message of resilience and forgiveness to countless Porter County eighth graders over the years, has died.

Kor, 85, died Thursday while visiting the Auschwitz concentration camp while with an entourage from the CANDLES Holocaust Museum and Education Center, which she founded in Terre Haute, Indiana, according to a statement on the museum's website.

Kor and her twin, Miriam, survived inhumane experiments done on twins by Nazi doctor Josef Mengele at Auschwitz after the two were taken from their mother at age 10 when they arrived at the concentration camp.

"But rather than allowing the darkest moments of her life to define her, she moved forward headfirst into a life of purpose," the museum statement noted.

Kor's most recent visit to Northwest Indiana was in November, when she spoke to a standing-room-only crowd at Harre Union on the Valparaiso University campus.

At the time, she declined to comment on national events when questioned about a rise in nationalism and anti-immigration policies.

"I do not get involved in politics," she said then to applause, later explaining herself further, citing the nonprofit status of CANDLES, which she didn't want to jeopardize. "If I say I support or lean to one side, someone will get angry with me. I do have an opinion, and I'm entitled to keep it private."

Kor's visit to the university was sponsored by VU, the Valparaiso International Center, and Valparaiso's Human Relations Council, and was meant to bring her message to an audience beyond the community's eighth graders, said Duane Davison, founder of the international center.

Kor, said Davison, gave life to the abstract, historic concepts of World War II and the Holocaust, particularly for the eighth graders who saw her speak over the years, many of whom returned to see her at the university.

"They won't necessarily remember a single phrase but they will remember the impact of her messages," he said, adding bringing Kor to the university was one of the most important contributions made to the community by the international center.

Kor had a medical emergency a couple of days before her visit to VU but that didn't slow her down during her visit.

"We spent the entire day with her and she was as feisty and relevant as ever," Davison said, admitting he chuckled over her last tweet, on July 3, about getting chicken McNuggets at a McDonald's near Auschwitz, because her lunch request while she was in Valparaiso was for the same.

He finds symbolism in the fact that Kor died while on a trip to Auschwitz.

"Of all the places she could've passed away, how interesting it was she passed there," he said.

Heath Carter, the former chair of the Human Relations Council, also noted Kor's lasting legacy.

"Around the world people are mourning the passing of Eva Kor because her message of enduring love and forgiveness — in the face of even the most insidious hate — speaks to us all," he said in an email. "We in Valpo were fortunate to hear from her this past fall and will be reflecting upon her powerful legacy for years to come."

Over time and in the different places she's lived, Robin Damsky, rabbi at Temple Israel in Gary's Miller neighborhood, said she's met many Holocaust survivors, including those who, like Kor, made it their life's work to teach and speak about their experiences.

Their numbers are dwindling over time, she said, and so is their ability to bear witness against those who deny the Holocaust ever happened.

"Every loss of a survivor is a loss of a period of that time," she said.

Gov. Eric Holcomb issued a statement Thursday about Kor.

"Everywhere she went, Eva brought light into darkness and provided comfort to those in pain unlike anyone we've ever met," he said. "From her against all odds survival as a young girl in Auschwitz to her peace spreading message based from home in Terre Haute, Indiana, her relentless and optimistic example inspired the world. Her angelic spirit will live on in the countless souls she saved from ongoing confusion and torment."

we are trying to save lives, so it was important for us to be able to start something that we can identify with in the community and give back to the community. If you know us more than two minutes — that's one of our biggest concerns."

Most urgent cares can treat ailments such as sprains, lacerations, colds and STDs, but Premier also offers a full-service on-site lab for same-day results, X-ray capabilities and drug testing for would-be employees, filling a need for area businesses.

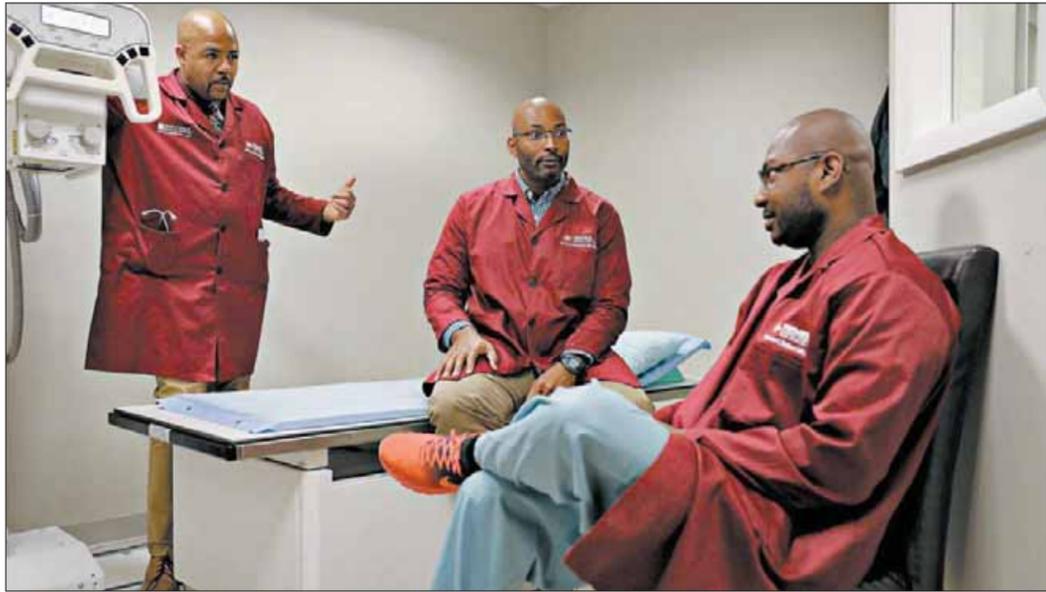

"We're not in competition with your primary care doctors, we're not in competition with ERs," Rutland said. "You know your body, and when it's in crisis mode, that's when you go to the emergency room. But when you have minor annoyances — I need to be seen by a doctor, but I don't have time to wait — that's when you go to an urgent care."

McGee, Rutland and Richardson, colleagues at Methodist Hospitals in Gary and Merrillville, Indiana, founded Premier after noticing insurance companies start to encourage urgent care visits over hospitals.

"It made sense that we all get together since we had the same desire to improve things, to try and help with urban health," McGee said. "We want to see improvement in our urban environment. We were doing it already at Gary Methodist, working together to save lives. It just made sense that we do this venture."

McGee said the goal is to be a one-stop shop, an approach they eventually hope to replicate elsewhere in the city.

POP holds seminars, provides college and career readiness opportunities, and encourages mentorship, connecting youth with medical professionals to shadow them at work and learn procedures like CPR.

Once in school or residency, Rutland said students often call with questions, looking for advice on current cases, or simply for reassurance.

"I didn't have anybody that I could call when I was a medical student or resident to say: 'Hey, this is what I'm going through. Is it right? I'm nervous about this? That's why I don't mind doing it,'" Rutland said. "We want to show that you don't have to be rich and you don't have to be a genius to get through medical school. A lot of kids think that only other people can go into health careers, and I said, no — anyone can do this. This is something you can do. You can become a physician."

Kenneth Furlough, 27 and a fourth-year student at Chicago Medical School, said he admires the Premier founders for opening the facility and for their community service and career guidance. "People who look like you and have a background that can educate you in a way that will help you progress forward — that's what it's all about," said Furlough, who is black. Leslie Amonoo, 33 and a third-year student at Chicago Medical School, agrees. The pair run a podcast about health equity, community development and financial literacy.

"To have people that you can relate to — that look like you and can understand some of the family situations you go through — is huge because you're not always at ease when you go to other facilities with people who may not understand where you're coming from, or your background, and how you grew up," he said. "This urgent care is vital."

to bring caterpillars inside and hand-rear them until they matured into butterflies, but there was a little piece inside of her that questioned, "What if I don't know what I'm doing?"

"A friend of mine was into (raising monarchs), and she told me one out of 10 makes it in their natural habitat," Hallman recalled. "So I thought, 'OK, I guess I wouldn't feel bad — I think I can do a better job.'"

Monarch Joint Venture confirms this stat, saying that "researchers agree that less than 10% of the eggs that are laid survive to become adult butterflies, and some feel that this number may be significantly under 10%."

According to information from the Field Museum, "monarch populations have decreased by 80 percent over the past two decades." The decline of milkweed plants and other nectar food sources, the monarch's habitat, are a big part of the insect's population drop-off, the site explains.

From June to October, her first year raising monarchs, Hallman hand-reared 20 butterflies from egg to flight. Only one didn't make it out of its chrysalis, she said, "So I thought that was pretty good."

Lex Winter, an environmental social scientist at the Keller Science Action Center at the Field Museum, said there are two kinds of monarch-raising practices that typically get lumped together by the science community: captive breeding and captive rearing.

The former is typically a for-profit endeavor with the goal of releasing monarchs, for instance, at events like weddings. Captive breeders keep "adult monarchs in captivity and (create) a colony to produce hundreds or thousands of monarchs; some of these are retained for continued captive breeding," explains the Xerces Society for Invertebrate Conservation in a blog post.

"There's a pretty wide consensus that's a bad idea," said Winter about captive breeding.

Captive rearing, as Hallman does, is "the practice of collecting eggs, caterpillars, or pupae (chrysalises) from the wild, raising them in captivity and then releasing them," the Xerces Society says in the same blog post.

Winter, who remains neutral in the debate over captive rearing, said some of the concerns about the practice include fears that the butterflies' genetic makeup will be modified if they're protected from natural forces, and that parasites and diseases could spread if butterflies are reared in captivity in large numbers.

"That's a valid concern," said Winter, "but the people (who are captive rearing) are very meticulous and very careful."

Hallman starts with the eggs because if you bring in caterpillars, she said, "they can already be infected — like if it got some kind of parasite, it can give it to the others, and they might not survive."

She finds the eggs on a milkweed leaf, then breaks the leaf off, and brings it inside her home. Hallman grabs a jar, places a damp paper towel in the bottom and puts in the leaf with the eggs on top. She checks the jar daily to see if anything's changed.

Once the caterpillars hatch and begin to grow, she puts them in "a little insect mesh netting cube," where they eventually form their chrysalis.

"I typically have four to five butterflies in the cube," she said. "They pretty much (emerge from their chrysalis) around the same time; about two or three pop open on the same day." She leaves the monarch butterflies in the cube for a few hours to dry their wings, she said.

"We'll open the cube in the backyard and see what happens. Some fly right out, and others sit in the cage for another hour," said Hallman. "Sometimes they hang around for the rest of the day, flying around the yard. Other times, they just go: They fly up in a tree, and that's it."

Winter is trying to act as a bridge between the two communities in the captive rearing debate.

In February, she conducted an online survey on monarch rearing. She posted the survey's link in a monarch devotee Facebook group with about 20,000 members and analyzed the first 100 responses. The group was self-selected, not a random or statistically representative sample, Winter explained.

"I learned that a lot of (the hobbyists) feel condescended (to) by the science community because the conversation can be dismissive," Winter said. "But people are like, 'I'm helping,' and they want their voice to be heard."

One misconception about rearing that often comes across as condescending is that the hobbyists keep the butterflies as companions.

"The relationship they have with the monarch, it's not always thought of as their pet," said Winter. "There is a lot of care, but they're approaching the rearing as a scientist and making really good, detailed observations."

Lisa Meehan, a friend of Hallman's who began hand-rearing monarchs about three years ago, doesn't believe the practice is necessarily going to help the species, as a whole, but does think it's beneficial to humans' relationship with nature.

"I do think (raising monarchs) will help everyone who watches the process pay more attention to butterflies, bees and other pollinators that are disappearing," she said. "It's hard for us to make connections with animals, bugs and birds without seeing it up close, and appreciating what they go through and watching the life cycle."

For Hallman, deciding to hand-rear was just a practical, sensible way to do her part.

"I said, 'Why not do it? We've already got this big garden with the butterflies and the bees, so why not add another thing, especially since they're on a decline?'" she said. "Everybody loves seeing butterflies."

Harris hauls in $12M, but still has long haul

Despite big quarter, senator trails Biden, Sanders, Buttigieg

By JOHN WAGNER
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — Sen. Kamala Harris of California said Friday that she raised nearly $12 million for her presidential bid over the past three months, a substantial take but one that lags some of the other top-tier Democratic White House hopefuls.

The haul by Harris, who has risen in several polls since her aggressive performance in last week's debate, compares to the $21.5 million that former Vice President Joe Biden announced he raised during the second quarter and the $18 million Sen. Bernie Sanders, I-Vt., said he took in during the period.

Biden, Sanders, Harris and Sen. Elizabeth Warren, D-Mass., have finished in the top four in recent national polling among the crowded Democratic field. Warren has yet to announce a fundraising total for the second quarter.

South Bend, Indiana, Mayor Pete Buttigieg, who has lagged behind the top four in polling, has announced the largest haul of the quarter so far of the Democrats: $24.8 million.

Candidates have until July 15 to file fundraising reports with the Federal Election Commission, but those with impressive numbers typically share their totals soon after a quarter ends. Sunday was the final day of the second quarter.

Harris' second-quarter fundraising figure roughly matches what she reported

Sen. Kamala Harris speaks at the National Education Association Strong Public Schools Presidential Forum on Friday.

Sen. Elizabeth Warren says that if she's elected president she will sign executive orders to help women of color.

raising during the first quarter of the year. However, she did not become a candidate until three weeks into that quarter.

Harris' campaign said it raised $7 million of its nearly $12 million from its digital program. It said it raised nearly $500,000 from its online store, which features "That Little Girl Was Me" T-shirts.

The shirt references a line from the Democratic presidential debate in which Harris said that she was bused to school as a girl as she attacked Biden for his opposition to federally mandated busing in the 1970s. Harris' campaign said the T-shirt began selling on June 28.

Harris aides emphasized that she is not accepting money from corporate political action committees and federal lobbyists.

"As it has been from the beginning, this campaign is powered by the people,"

Harris campaign manager Juan Rodriguez said in a statement. "These resources will help expand Kamala's growing strength in this primary and put her in position to win the Democratic nomination."

Montana Gov. Steve Bullock said Friday that he had raised more than $2 million for his Democratic presidential bid since mid-May. Bullock's campaign said he had received support from all 50 states and that his total did not include transfers from other campaign funds.

"It's clear Governor Bullock's message of winning back places Democrats lost in 2016 and ending dark money's corrupting influence will resonate in early states like Iowa and New Hampshire, and he will continue working to earn every vote," his campaign manager, Jenn Ridder, said in a statement.

A Washington Post-ABC News poll published this week found Biden winning 29% of the Democratic vote nationally, followed by Sanders with 23%. Harris and Warren were tied for third, with 11%.

Buttigieg ran fifth, with 4%, in a tie with former housing secretary Julián Castro, who staked out a position in the first debate calling for decriminalization of the border that framed the discussion of the immigration issue.

■ In other news, Warren said that if elected president she would sign executive orders aimed at addressing the wage and employment leadership gap for women of color, punishing companies and contractors with historically poor records on diversity and equality by denying them federal government contracts.

The Massachusetts senator detailed her latest plan in a post on Medium on Friday, positioning her ideas as moral and economic imperatives.

"Our economy should be working just as hard for women of color as women of color work for our economy and their families," Warren wrote. "For decades, the government has helped perpetuate the systemic discrimination that has denied women of color equal opportunities. It's time for the government to try to right those wrongs and boost our economy in the process."

Warren's plan comes on the eve of her appearance at Essence Fest, an annual music and cultural conference that is the largest gathering of black women in the country, with an expected 500,000 attendees. Also expected to speak this weekend at the conference in New Orleans are Harris and Buttigieg and other 2020 contenders Cory Booker and Beto O'Rourke.

The proposals by Warren, who also posted to the Essence website, are aimed not only at black women but also at Latina, Asian and Native American women.

To address the underrepresentation of women of color in leadership in the federal workforce, Warren said she would issue an order to recruit from historically black colleges and other minority-serving institutions; establish paid fellowships for federal jobs for minority and low-income applicants, including formerly incarcerated people; and require federal agencies to incorporate diversity into their strategic plans and mentorship efforts.

Both sides in Sudan political crisis hail power-sharing deal

By FAY ABUELGASIM
AND NOHA ELHENAWY
Associated Press

KHARTOUM, Sudan — Sudan's ruling military council and its pro-democracy movement both welcomed a new power-sharing agreement reached Friday, raising hopes that the deal would end a three-month political crisis that has paralyzed the country and led to scores of deaths following a violent crackdown on peaceful protesters by authorities.

News of the deal, which one analyst said followed regional and international pressure on both sides, touched off street celebrations in the capital of Khartoum with hundreds dancing and waving Sudan's flag as drivers honked their horns. The crisis has gripped Sudan ever since the military ousted longtime autocrat Omar el-Bashir in April.

The sides agreed to form a joint military and civilian sovereign council to lead the country during a transition period of three years and three months, said a statement by the Sudanese Professionals' Association, which has spearheaded the protests. The joint council had been a sticking point in the negotiations.

The council will include five civilians representing the protest movement and five military members. An 11th seat will go to a civilian chosen by both sides. A military member will preside over the council for the first 21 months, followed by a civilian member after that, according to the statement.

That suggested a significant concession by pro-democracy forces, which had insisted that the sovereign council have only a civilian president. But the deal also secured a key demand by protest leaders: that they select the members of a technocratic Cabinet to be formed independently from the generals.

The creation of a legislative council will be postponed for three months, during which time the sovereign council will make the nation's laws.

"Today, our revolution has won and our victory shines," the SPA said in the statement, which was posted on its Facebook page.

The generals also hailed the deal, with the military-controlled Al-Sudan TV channel playing national songs and rerunning excerpts of the news conference by both sides announcing the agreement, with the caption: "Congratulations to the Sudanese people."

The talks had collapsed when security forces razed a protest camp outside the military headquarters in Khartoum on June 3, and protest leaders said more than 100 people have been killed since then.

U.N. Secretary-General Antonio Guterres hailed the deal and urged all sides to "ensure the timely, inclusive, and transparent implementation of the agreement and resolve any outstanding issues through dialogue."

Guterres also congratulated the African Union and Ethiopia on their efforts to bring the parties back to the negotiating table.

The negotiations had resumed this week after tens of thousands of people flooded the streets of Sudan's main cities last weekend in the biggest demonstrations since the sit-in camp was razed. At least 11 people were killed, according to protest organizers.

Maduro revels in military's might on independence day

By SCOTT SMITH
Associated Press

CARACAS, Venezuela — Venezuela's President Nicolas Maduro oversaw a grand military parade to mark the country's independence day Friday, reveling in his might as commander in chief as the embattled socialist leader comes under mounting criticism for using brutal tactics to crush his opponents.

Maduro applauded and pumped his fist as soldiers marched past, tanks rolled by and fighter jets streaked overhead at a Caracas military base. A unit of camouflaged special forces, guns drawn, shouted their loyalty as they paraded by the presidential reviewing stand.

"We look to the heavens, asking for peace," Maduro said. "All the while our military exercises play out. We plead to God with our missiles pointed."

The parade served as a demonstration of Maduro's continuing support from the military amid a political standoff with opposition leader Juan Guaido, who is trying to oust Maduro and has the backing of more than 50 nations, including the United States.

Guaido, who led a rival march across town Friday, claimed presidential powers in January, at the time drawing throngs of supporters for demonstrations against Maduro, who has overseen the oil-rich nation's historic collapse.

More than 4 million Venezuelans have fled the struggling country amid food and medicine shortages and crushing inflation.

As head of the opposition-controlled National Assembly, Guaido claims that Maduro's election in 2018 to a second, six-year term is illegitimate because the most popular political figures and parties were barred from running.

aside, blaming Venezuela's woes on an economic war against the country led by the Trump administration, and Guaido has not been able to lure a critical mass of soldiers to back him.

In his brief address, Maduro renewed his call for a dialogue with the opposition. As he spoke, members of Venezuela's militia each held a cardboard box of the type used to distribute government-subsidized food.

Despite the splashy military parade, Maduro has had some defectors. Colombian authorities say a few hundred soldiers have abandoned Maduro in recent months.

Most notably, Maduro's spy chief, Gen. Manuel Cristopher Figuera, fled after a failed military uprising staged April 30 with Guaido and another popular opposition leader, Leopoldo Lopez.

Now in the United States, Figuera says his mission is to "seek help to free my country from disgrace."

In a sign of increasing international repudiation of Maduro, the U.N. high commissioner for human rights, Michelle Bachelet, issued a scathing report Thursday accusing Venezuela's security forces of nearly 5,300 killings last year.

Venezuelans interviewed by the human rights workers referred to a particular security unit, FAES, as a "death squad" or "extermination group."

But Venezuelan Deputy Foreign Minister William Castillo blasted the U.N. report, saying it failed to reflect "the reality in our country."

Security forces turned out at just 15% of 89 anti-Maduro demonstrations nationwide Friday, a dramatic departure from the government's zero-tolerance stance, according to figures Guaido's team provided to The Associated Press, which could not independently confirm them.

National Assembly lawmaker Marco Quinones said that shows the government's fear of international repercussions following the U.N. report, or it is proof of eroding support for Maduro among soldiers, who no longer want to repress their fellow citizens with tear gas and shotguns.

Across town, Guaido called on Venezuelans to take to the streets with him Friday for demonstrations marking 208 years since Venezuela won its freedom from Spain. A few thousand joined him, far fewer than the number who turned out at demonstrations earlier this year.

Statue, which Egypt claims was stolen, sells for $6M in London

CAIRO — A 3,000-year-old bust of Egypt's boy king Tutankhamen was auctioned off Thursday in London for nearly $6 million, despite claims by the Egyptian government that it was looted and smuggled out of the country.

The sale by the Christie's auction house came a day after Egypt's Foreign Ministry and its Antiquities Ministry issued a joint statement condemning the company for going ahead with the sale.

They claimed the sale is not valid because the auction house has not been able to verify the ownership of the 11-inch brown quartzite statue of the pharaoh, widely referred to as King Tut.

In a statement, Christie's said it never would have sold the statue if there were legitimate concerns. Egypt, the company said, did not express concern when the bust was publicly displayed for a number of years.

Aftershocks follow a day after Southern California earthquake

LOS ANGELES — Aftershocks from Southern California's largest earthquake in 20 years rumbled beneath the Mojave Desert on Friday as authorities tallied damage in the sparsely populated region.

The strongest aftershock hit shortly after 4 a.m., registering magnitude 5.4 and awakening people all the way to the coast.

Thursday's 6.4 magnitude quake struck at mid-morning about 150 miles northeast of Los Angeles, near the town of Ridgecrest and a sprawling Navy installation.

Multiple injuries and two house fires were reported in the town of 28,000.

Emergency crews dealt with small vegetation fires, gas leaks and reports of cracked roads, said Kern County Fire Chief David Witt.

Russians with links to infamous troll farm under arrest in Libya

MOSCOW — Two people with links to an infamous Russian troll farm have been arrested in Libya, their employer, who has been put on the U.S. sanctions list, said Friday.

The Foundation for the Protection of Traditional Values said its employees, including well-known spin doctor Maxim Shugaley, have been detained in Libya since May. It said that it has been working quietly to secure the men's release.

The obscure think-tank did not explain the charges the men are facing but insisted that its employees did not interfere in any elections in Libya.

Shugaley and the think-tank are connected to the infamous Russian troll farm that featured prominently in the probe by special counsel Robert Mueller into Russian interference in the 2016 U.S. presidential election.

Mothers rally as Hong Kong's divide shows no sign of closing

HONG KONG — Hong Kong's societal divide showed no sign of closing Friday as students rebuffed an offer from city leader Carrie Lam to meet and a few thousand mothers rallied in support of young protesters who left a trail of destruction in the legislature's building at the start of the week.

The mainland's economic influence loomed large at the rally, held in a square under the towering offices of the Bank of China and other Chinese banks. Many young people feel left out of the China-driven economy, struggling to make ends meet and stuck in tiny apartments because of soaring real estate prices. They think a democratically elected government would be more responsive than one chosen by pro-Berlin elites who benefit from the economic ties to the mainland.

The Monday night assault on the legislature — in which glass walls were shattered, slogans spray-painted over the walls and the electronic voting system destroyed — seems to have hardened positions on both sides.

Lam, who disappeared from public view for two weeks as protests mounted, pledged to do a better job of listening to the voices of young people in a speech on Monday.

But her invitation later in the week to meet behind closed doors was rebuffed by student unions at two Hong Kong universities as insincere and a publicity gimmick.

Student leaders said at a news conference Friday that any meeting should be public and include a wider representation than just them. They also demanded that protesters, dozens of whom have been arrested, would not be prosecuted.

Utah police: Body of slain student recovered

SALT LAKE CITY — The body of a slain college student has been recovered in a canyon about 85 miles away from a backyard in Salt Lake City where other remains were found last week, police said Friday.

The disclosure came in the case involving 23-year-old Mackenzie Lueck.

Authorities previously said some of her charred remains and personal belongings were found in a suspect's backyard in Salt Lake City. The body was discovered Wednesday.

The canyon is near Utah State University, where suspect Ayoola Ajayi, 31, sporadically took classes.

Lueck disappeared June 17, after returning from a trip to her home in California and took a Lyft from the airport to a park where she met someone. Ajayi was the last person she communicated with, and his cellphone puts him in the park at the same time, police have said.

Largest city in Alaska sets mark for high temperature

ANCHORAGE, Alaska — Three Alaska locations including the state's largest city reached record high temperatures on Independence Day, which an expert on Friday attributed to climate change.

"It's a weather story and it is an ongoing changing environment story as well as these kinds of extreme weather events become much more likely in a warming world," said Rick Thoman, a climate specialist at the University of Alaska Fairbanks.

The official temperature in Anchorage on Thursday afternoon climbed to 90 degrees for the first time.

The previous high for Anchorage was 85 degrees on June 14, 1969, the National Weather Service said. The average high temperature for July 4 is 75 degrees.

Kenai and King Salmon also set new high temperatures of 89 degrees.

In madder world, MAD to end newsstand issues

BY RACHEL LERMAN
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — MAD, the long-running satirical magazine that influenced everyone from “Weird Al” Yankovic to the writers of “The Simpsons,” will be leaving newsstands after its August issue. Really.

The illustrated humor magazine — instantly recognizable by the gap-toothed smiling face of mascot Alfred E. Neuman — will still be available in comic shops and through mail to subscribers. But after its fall issue it will just reprint previously published material.

The only new material will come in special editions at the end of the year. DC, the division of Warner Brothers that publishes the magazine, said MAD will pull from nostalgic cartoons and parodies published over the magazine’s 67-year run.

As Neuman would say, “What, me worry?” Worry not, for MAD has more than 550 issues packed full of political parodies and edgy humor to pull from.

The magazine set itself apart as a cultural beacon for decades with its unabashed tendency to make fun of anything and push conventional boundaries.

One of MAD’s best-known comic series, Spy vs. Spy, featured two spies with beak-like faces and big eyes — costumes that are still regularly worn on Halloween.

It even seemingly parodied fellow popular magazine Playboy, with its Fold-

In feature that appeared in nearly every issue. But instead of featuring models, the Fold-In printed — what else? — another joke.

DC will keep publishing MAD special collections and books.

Illustrators and comedians, including one-time guest editor Yankovic, mourned the magazine’s effective closure. “It’s pretty much the reason I turned out weird,” he wrote on Twitter.

Josh Weinstein, a writer and producer of “The Simpsons” — which has referenced MAD many times — thanked the magazine on Twitter for its inspiring effect on eras of comedy.

“There was a moment in so many of our childhoods where you were the greatest thing ever,” he wrote.

Comedian Harry Shearer, the voice of several characters on “The Simpsons,” cracked on Twitter: “An American institution has closed. And who wants to live in an institution?”

When President Donald Trump referred to Democratic presidential hopeful Pete Buttigieg as Neuman, while insisting he wouldn’t be fit to serve as president, the 37-year-old candidate said he had to Google the reference.

“I guess it’s just a generational thing,” Buttigieg told Politico.

Cartoonist Evan Dorkin, who worked for MAD, wrote on Twitter that the magazine was long a source of happiness and inspiration for him.

“I hope we provided some smiles to some readers of the past 12 yrs,” he wrote.

The magazine changed as its circumstances did, he wrote, including when the magazine began printing advertisements in 2001 and when it moved from New York City to Burbank, California, at the end of 2017.

That move warped MAD’s identity, Dorkin said.

Copter crash reportedly kills W.Va. coal baron in Bahamas

BY MARISA IATI
The Washington Post

Billionaire coal baron Chris Cline, whose mines were among the most productive in the country, died in a Fourth of July helicopter crash that killed seven people traveling from the Bahamas to Fort Lauderdale, Florida, according to multiple reports.

Cline, a West Virginia native, would have turned 61 on Friday.

Bahamian police said four women and three men on board died in the crash, but they did not name the victims — and civil aviation authorities said their identities were unknown. All seven passengers were Americans, The Associated Press reported.

West Virginia Gov. Jim Justice, a Republican, told the Register-Herald newspaper that Cline was among the dead and took to Twitter to call Cline “a W.Va. superstar” and “a very close friend.”

“Chris Cline built an empire and on every occasion was always there to give,” Justice wrote. “What a wonderful, loving, and giving man.”

Brian Glasser, an attorney for Cline, confirmed to Bloomberg News that his client was killed in the helicopter crash.

“He was a young man,” Glasser said. “He was audacious. He was a great man, and he will be missed.”

Glasser wrote on Twitter that Cline was the most courageous person he had represented.

“A billionaire, he never lost touch with the days he lived in a double wide and used a blow dryer to thaw his winter pipes,” Glasser said.

The helicopter took off from Big Grand Cay around 2 a.m. Thursday and was reported missing in the afternoon when it did not arrive in Fort Lauderdale, the Royal Bahamas Police Force said in a statement. Authorities said police and local residents found the helicopter overturned in 16 feet of water about two miles off the island.

Police did not identify a cause of the crash but said officials, including the Department of Civil Aviation and the Defense Force, were investigating.

Evan Jenkins, a justice of West Virginia’s Supreme Court, said in a statement that Cline, his daughter, friends and pilot had died in the wreck. Cline had loved West Virginia, Jenkins wrote.

“His selfless and generous support for programs and projects throughout the state improved the lives of countless West Virginians,” Jenkins said. “His life’s story was one of hard work, love of family and caring support for others.”

At the age of 22, Cline followed his father’s and grandfather’s footsteps into the underground coal mines of southern West Virginia, according to the website of his company, Foresight Energy. He later formed his own energy development company, the Cline Group, which rose to become one of the top 20 coal producers in the United States.

Cline also founded Foresight Energy to operate mines in Illinois. The firm earned $1.097 billion in coal sales in 2018, according to its website.

That success led Cline to a life of luxury, radio network West Virginia MetroNews reported. His 150-acre property in Beckley, West Virginia, included a go-kart track, a lake and pastures for Cline’s goats, horses and llamas, MetroNews said. Cline also owned a yacht called Mine Games, the report said, and a mansion in North Palm Beach, Florida.

In 2010, Bloomberg dubbed Cline the “New King Coal.” By 2015, Bloomberg had made a slight change to the nickname, calling him, simply, “the King of Coal.”

Cline, a major Republican donor, later gave $1 million to President Donald Trump’s inaugural committee, according to OpenSecrets.org from the Center for Responsive Politics. He also donated to the failed presidential campaign of Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., according to The New York Times.

Cline’s family foundation has donated millions to Marshall University, including a $5 million gift for sports medicine research. The athletic complex on campus is named in Cline’s honor. Cline attended Marshall but dropped out to get into the coal business with his father.

VOICE OF THE PEOPLE

Military parade displays ignorance

Using tanks and planes to demonstrate U.S. military might on the Fourth of July mainly demonstrates a shocking ignorance of history and deficit of irony. Our Founders rebelled against an empire, taking up arms that, in the early going of the Revolution, were often their personal weapons or cached by the local militia. The Constitution they later penned envisioned no permanent military, but an armed and trained populace, ever vigilant against tyranny, with Congress able to muster armed forces should the need arise.

Parades of military hardware are the hallmark of strongmen and bullies, and of far-flung expansionist powers, not democracies. The idea that 243 years after the signing of the Declaration, the U.S. would have fleets and bases around the globe that make the old British Empire pale in comparison, or that we would be mired in seemingly endless war in Central Asia that has more to do with mineral wealth than with the defense of the 50 states, would appall likely every signer.

Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration whose anniversary we celebrate on the Fourth of July, wrote that a standing army was dangerous to the rights of a nation, and inconsistent with a people's freedom. Chest-beating and saber-rattling is a grotesque perversion of everything for which the holiday stands.

— Jeff Smith, Evanston

Socialized medicine is not utopian

Many Democratic presidential candidates are touting "Medicare for All" or socialized medicine such as they have in Canada and much of Europe. It is claimed that everyone will be able to get the quality care they need without the huge cost.

I grew up in Canada, which had excellent health care, and left before socialized medicine was introduced. Unfortunately, the quality of and access to health care became dependent on the government budget.

My mother had a heart attack; she was fast-tracked because her husband was a doctor and had to wait only a few weeks for her heart surgery.

Her friend wasn't as lucky; he was sent home for six months — until there was an opening — and told not to raise his arms above his head.

My siblings and I were all unhappy with the care our mother was receiving from her internist. I checked with the provincial medical department and was told that the closest doctor with an opening for a new patient was about 50 miles out of town.

My sister was an ultrasound technician; she complained to me that there was only one ultrasound machine operating in the city after hours. A patient needing an emergency ultrasound would need to be transferred by ambulance (this is in the capital city of the province!).

I will take the system the U.S. has, perhaps with tweaks to make it more affordable and accessible, over government-controlled (Medicare for All or socialized) anytime.

— Carole Cohen, Skokie

Make a difference, Chicagoans

In 2019 in Chicago, I want people to know:

■ You should walk into your alderman's office and demand he or she know who you are and what you care about.

■ We live in an era of inequality and apathy, in a tale of two Chicagos. Don't trust or like the government or political parties? Then do not sit on the sidelines. About 34% of registered city voters cast a ballot in the February elections. From crime to displacement to poverty, the alarm bells in our city are ringing loudly. Stop sitting on your porch.

■ Democracy and democratic government are not a spectator sport; heroes will not swoop in from from the heavens to solve your issues. Volunteer in your community or start a grassroots movement. Better yet, run for office yourself.

■ If you only tweet about things you do not like, you are not changing anything on a citywide scale. And you are annoying to the average voter. Emphasize our unity and connect to our shared values, rather than slicing and dicing us up into all-or-nothing groups. You will find more compatriots this way.

■ Say hello to your neighbors, eyes-to-the-ground-AirPods-in-joker.

■ The urbanist Pete Saunders has described modern Chicago as one-third San Francisco and two-thirds Detroit. Whatever bit you're in, there are a lot of Chicagoans not in your bit. Be aware of this and know that we must share this city and improve this city as a unit. An absolute unit. A history of active policies and norms has brought us to this moment, in all its success and failure. Active policies and norms can get us to a better station as a single unit if we so demand.

■ With virtually all challenges you can face, what does not kill you will make you stronger. But you are not an island. Take care of yourself and others. You are up to the task, wherever you find yourself in life.

— Scott Jauch, Chicago

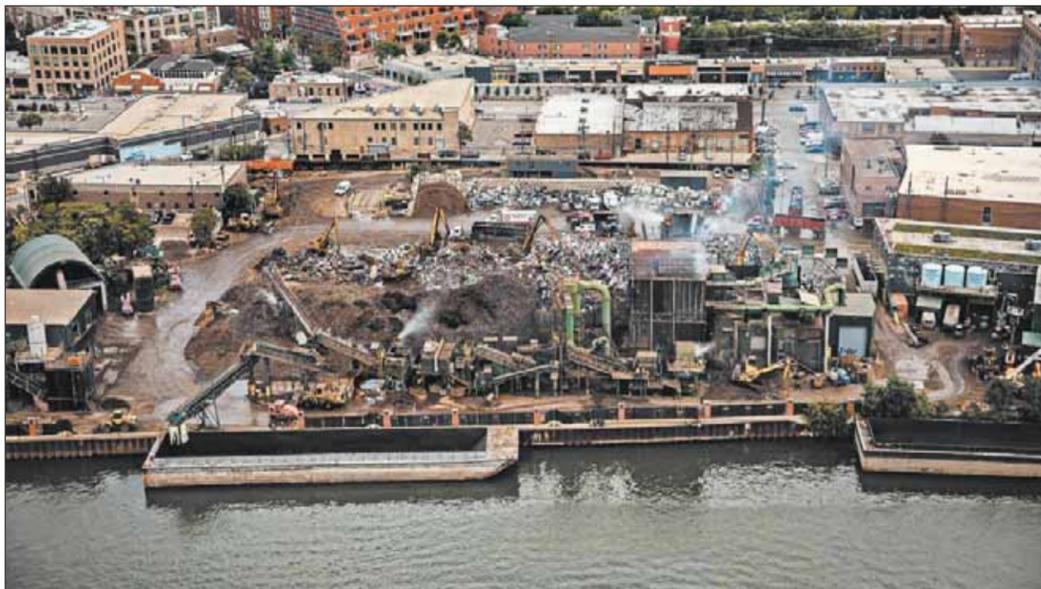

Not policing little things matters

My son just had his new bike, which was locked up, stolen in broad daylight at NBC Tower. His roommate had a part stolen from underneath her Jeep. Cars regularly speed and run stop signs in our Lakeview neighborhood. Bikes without lights run stop signs night and day.

Broken-windows policing is a style based on the broken-windows theory — namely, the idea that tolerating minor physical and social disorder in a neighborhood (such as graffiti, litter, aggressive panhandling or turnstile jumping) encourages serious violent crime.

It's no wonder Chicago crime is out of control.

— Mike Davitt, Chicago

An aerial view of the General Iron Industries plant on the North Branch of the Chicago River in Chicago in September.

The sneaky scrap yard deal Emanuel dumped on Lightfoot

Chicago is a city of neighborhoods. When City Hall deliberates over a project or enterprise that can profoundly affect a neighborhood, it needs to involve the people who live there.

Keep that in mind as you ponder developments regarding a scrap metal recycler in Lincoln Park and its fraught relationship with the 47,500 people who live within a mile of the scrap yard.

General Iron Industries shreds scrap metal — flattened cars, used appliances and more. The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has had the company on its watch list of chronic polluters since the late 1990s. The EPA cited General Iron in July 2018 for failing to contain lung-damaging particulate matter within the company's property, and accused the firm of failing to reduce emissions of harmful chemicals.

People who live near the General Iron site along the North Branch of the Chicago River know how bad the pollution can get. They can smell it, they can feel it. Neighbors complain about finding an oily film on their cars and sidewalks, and having to regularly wash metallic particles off their patios.

Relief had been in sight. The company announced plans to shut down its Lincoln Park site by the end of next year and move operations to the Southeast Side. General Iron's owner, the Labkon family, also put up for sale 21.5 acres of the riverside land it owns.

Then, with one foot out the door, Mayor Rahm Emanuel's administration granted a three-year extension of General Iron's operating permit at the Lincoln Park site until February 2022, according to the Tribune's Michael Hawthorne.

Hawthorne reports that, while General Iron officials say their plan is still to move to the Southeast Side by the end of next year, the new permits from the Emanuel team give the company leeway in case the sale of the land or the move fall through.

That's wiggle room that General Iron never should have received, says Ald. Brian Hopkins, 2nd, whose ward includes the scrap yard and the neighborhoods surrounding it. "They jammed this through while nobody was looking," Hopkins told Hawthorne. "If they are really planning to move next year, why didn't they seek a permit for the North Side that expires then?"

Hopkins only recently learned of the Emanuel administration's last-minute helping hand to General Iron. He wasn't notified in advance, and neither were the thousands of residents who live near the scrap recycling yard.

We don't know why Rahm's team bent over backward for the Labkon family. We do know that a dozen City Hall lobbyists have been on the Labkon family's payroll in recent years. We also know the family also has doled out more than $500,000 in political contributions to local politicians in recent years, including Emanuel.

Emanuel is gone. We hope the kind of opacity reflected in the permit extensions General Iron received is also gone. We also hope Mayor Lori Lightfoot takes a look at how and why these permit extensions were granted, and whether they should be rescinded.

Trust in City Hall has taken a hard hit, thanks to the latest spate of City Council corruption scandals. A lack of transparency — in zoning issues, in permits for scrap metal recyclers, in any city endeavor — further erodes that trust.

WHAT OTHERS ARE SAYING

Today, half of the millennials you talk to will buy a cup of coffee at a store. The other half will take the first step to becoming a millionaire by saving that $3 per day — $21 per week — $1,100 per year — and, if invested at the average 11% rate of return in the stock market, over $88,000 when a high school senior turns 60 years old. Not too shabby. And that's based on skipping the average cup of coffee, not the expensive gourmet coffee. ...

The financial potential of not drinking coffee or making it at home instead of going to Starbucks or Peet's is so powerful that skipping a cup of coffee for 42 years and instead investing the money will result in $879,000 for your nest egg, according to the official investment calculator of the U.S. government. ...

While making coffee at home isn't free, its cost is a tiny fraction of purchasing the hot cup at Starbucks or Dunkin' Donuts. This small sacrifice creates new opportunities for wealth creation, improves quality of life and opens the drinker's eyes to a much larger world of life choices. ...

Money and life are meant to be enjoyed and appreciated. Go on vacation, enjoy a cup of brew, go to your favorite sports game or theater production. ...

Whatever choice you make, just remember: Millionaires make their own coffee.

Lupe Fiasco speaks Tuesday at the Stony Island Arts Bank before a showing of his new series "Beat N' Path," which follows the Chicago artist as he travels through China.

Lupe Fiasco goes to China

Artist reconnects with martial arts, lessons learned as a youth in new docu-series

BY DARCEL ROCKETT

The Chicago artist known as Lupe Fiasco is a person of many layers. The West Side native, born Wasalu Jaco, who burst onto the scene with the album "Food & Liquor" and its single "Kick, Push" in 2006, is a person born and raised in the tradition of martial arts.

According to Fiasco, his fans never really saw that side of him, even though hints of it pop up here and there in his music, but he hopes that changes now that the docu-series "Beat N' Path" has been released. The show follows Fiasco as he embarks on a cross-cultural journey across China to explore his passion for martial arts. The series premiered to an audience of family and friends at the Stony Island Arts Bank on Tuesday.

Jaco took the trip two years ago in an effort to "learn from the source," a family tradition that had been ingrained in his DNA from childhood. Introduced to the martial arts by his late father, Gregory Jaco, who ran numerous martial arts schools for youth in the Chicagoland area, Fiasco sought a deeper connection to lessons of his youth, movements and skills he practices to this day. What is now the Stony Island Arts Bank lawn used to be the site of one of Gregory Jaco's schools in the '80s and '90s.

"Our school was traditionally based in the Japanese and the Korean systems, so either Aikido, Hapkido, Karate, but it was opened to whatever styles we wanted to practice or train in," Lupe Fiasco said. "I still practice Iaido — that's what my father was famous for — using samurai swords to cut cigarettes out of other people's mouths. That's what I continue to train in today."

In the show — which consists of nine episodes (approximately 10 minutes each) — viewers get to witness Fiasco's journey East to learn from trainers and masters of different styles of martial arts like Shaolin Kung Fu, Wushu and Nei Jia Quan (tai chi). Don't worry, music factors in as well, but then again so does the art of face-changing or Bian Lian, a Chinese art that involves colorful masks.

Fiasco's sister, Ayesha Jaco, Rebuild Foundation's 2019 Dancer in Residence, said the motivation behind the series was "almost a full circle moment."

"When he told me he was doing this, I was just amazed. If our father was living, I think it would have been a dream come true to have his son go to China to learn kung fu and to fuse that with his music," she said. I immediately helped in any way I could by going to find old photos that would help with the telling of the stories, so for me it was just amazing to see what we learned all our life get another platform not only for his fans, but for Chinese citizens and for everybody to see how serious he (Wasalu) is about the art and that it's really been something he's been doing all his life."

A former student of their father, Aurthur Montgomery, was at the premiere and said the project was "heartfelt and gratifying because it continued on the legacy that we started, literally next door."

"He makes you feel a part of it, because this is what we are," he said.

We spoke with Fiasco and his sisters Ayesha and Afrika at the series debut about Samurai Sundays on Ch. 66, the need for cultural exposure for youth and pop culture martial arts references. (FYI: Ayesha said Lupe has a bad "drunken monkey" style.)

The interview has been condensed and edited.

Q: Do you remember Samurai Sundays on Ch. 66?

A: We were Samurai Sunday — Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday — that was us. We were all the karate kids, we used to watch Samurai Sunday and then go into the yard and do all of the moves.

Q: So, when "Karate Kid" came out, you were like ... ?

A: For us, it was like, "We can do that." We would watch Samurai Sunday and say, Yeah, I can catch an arrow. A movie like "Karate Kid" still spoke volumes to us. It felt like one of the things we could relate to, because we were the karate kids. I remember being on the Red Line with a ninja sword on my back. That was when you could still take a ninja sword on the train back then.

Q: Tell us more about your training as a kid?

A: We trained at 63rd Street Beach and 35th and Michigan, I remember having to run barefoot in the snow about a quarter mile. That was conditioning your body. We used to run barefoot from the spot next door to Jackson Park. It didn't matter how old you were, we trained in the park, we trained in the Japanese Garden. It was a mandate in our house that once you were born, you studied the martial arts. Wasalu has taken that to the next level and just brought it to a larger audience — not in a commercial way but in a really heartfelt exhibition of our family tradition. It's kind of an homage to dad and out of all the children, he is the one who studied the art and continued on with the practice — from the samurai sword to Jiu Jitsu, Aikido — everything that was implanted in us, he continued it.

Q: Was Sho'nuff misunderstood in the

1985 film "The Last Dragon?"

A: No, he was a bully. He got what he deserved. But it does show that even bullies are able to attain "the glow."

Q: The series also shows a need for people of color to be exposed to other cultures. Expound on that.

A: That was the one thing my father was big on. We were the multicultural family. When he and my mom got married, they were converted to Islam, so we have that part of the culture to it, then the martial arts was a whole other Asian influence, he was also a musician (African drummer) so we had that aspect to it. He played the bagpipes — just a range of these different ideas and philosophies, flavors and tastes.

Q: Your house must have been the happening spot?

A: Yes. And it was all in the 'hood.

Q: Best martial arts film ever made?

A: "Blood Sport" with Jean-Claude Van Damme - Fiasco
 "Enter the Dragon" - Ayesha Jaco
 "Five Fingers of Death" - Afrika Jaco (Also their father's favorite.)

Q: What's next for you, Lupe?

A: Maybe there's a Season 2 in the works.

Q: What's next, music-wise?

A: I'm at a certain level of my craft where I'm just trying to incorporate new styles, learn new things, learn new conversations to have, learn new cultural products that I can put back into my music. It's less about selling records. I feel like I'm back in a sort of learning stage as an artist.

FitzGerald's 38th music fest hosts down-home roots rock

BY STEVE JOHNSON

Going on last, just before midnight on Wednesday's opening night of the 38th annual FitzGerald's American Music Festival, Jon Langford said, "We're the room clearers for the greatest roots music festival in America."

And that would be true, eventually, as people finally filtered out of the Berwyn club after a stellar Day One.

But first Langford's Waco Brothers, a veteran Chicago act, had a catalog of tunes to blister through, all jangly guitars and four-part vocal harmonies bellowed as if trying to be heard over the din of a pub.

The Wacos' music is perhaps more British than American roots, harkening back to the heyday of punk in Langford's native UK. But from Sarah Shook & The Disarmers, a rising country-punk outfit from North Carolina, to J.D. McPherson, an Oklahoman who plays revved-up rockabilly, the festival even on its first day covered a wide range of the roots-music spectrum.

And there were three days left to go for this longest-running Chicago summer rock festival. It is also in significant ways the most manageable, featuring 67 acts in total across three stages in the club, in its Side-bar and between the two, outside under a big tent.

The music starts at 1:30 p.m. Saturday, and adult tickets are $50 daily ($10 for children 12 and under; cash only). And the tradition of chef Tom Cimms providing a killer Cajun menu continues; his juicy cochon de lait (roast pork) poor boy is a worthy Southern rival to the classic Italian beef.

Still left to perform Saturday was a kind of Stars of FitzGerald's lineup, including Alejandro Escovedo, Marcia Ball and The Iguanas, plus up-and-coming singer-songwriter Nora Jane Struthers and third-generation bluesman Cedric Burnside.

Bill FitzGerald announced in mid-2017 that his family is looking for a buyer to take over the iconic venue, a mainstay in Chicago's Americana scene, but thus far none has emerged, he said.

So FitzGerald and many of his family members were on hand Wednesday, helping to manage ticket sales, bar operations and whatever else needed to be done.

Mostly, they got to hear a lot of good music. Chicago singer-songwriter Robbie Fulks and Merle Haggard veteran Redd Volkaert traded guitar riffs in an amiable set that blended Fulks' soulful portraits of hard living, Volkaert's interpretations of some classic Western swing tunes, and a whole lot of comic interplay between the two.

Cody Diekhoff, a native of downstate Delavan who performs as Chicago Farmer, was typically potent, showing off, with his band, some of the better roots songwriting in Chicago today.

The one-two punch of Shook and her posse and then McPherson and his had the crowd under the tent up and moving. Backed by a veteran band, Shook blended introspective, witty lyrics, undeniable melodies and vocals that she herself has characterized as "the voice of a fighter, not a lover." A bonus: She knows how to — and that it's okay to — end a song at three minutes.

STEVE JOHNSON/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Clinton Clegg and the Commonheart perform Wednesday at FitzGerald's in Berwyn.

McPherson's set was easily the night's most danceable. His is a throwback sound, including tunes by Link Wray (who should be in the rock hall of fame, McPherson said) and Nick Lowe, but with an intensely propulsive rhythm section.

Or maybe the Pittsburgh band The Commonheart was the most danceable. They were certainly the evening's revelation.

In the club, this nine(!)-piece nouveau

R&B outfit threw horns, backup singers, and songs about love both specific and universal into a winning gumbo. Charismatic frontman Clinton Clegg already seemed to be channeling aspects of Joe Cocker. And then the band did Randy Newman's "You Can Leave Your Hat On," a signature Cocker tune, as they took turns wearing the lead guitarist's hat.

This is a group that knows how to have, and deliver, a good time (and they'll be back at Schubas in November, Clegg said, a room not much bigger than FitzGerald's).

After that it was up to Langford (who also designed this year's festival tee-shirt) and his mates to perform clean-up duties, at least until another version of the cycle began the next day.

A scene from "My Friend Pedro."

VIDEO GAME REVIEW

2019's best action game with a talking banana

BY TODD MARTENS
Los Angeles Times

The problem isn't that so many games are centered around guns and violence. That would be a far larger pop-culture discussion than any one medium should shoulder. The issue is that so many games that are built around gunplay essentially ask the player to do the same thing: point and shoot.

"My Friend Pedro," however, tweaks the formula, a slick little indie game that feels authored rather than built by a committee. While violent — and essentially insane — the game concocts a loose, corporate-revenge plot that ultimately becomes an excuse to play at being a stunt coordinator.

Taking a relatively wide-angle lens approach to the action, "My Friend Pedro" asks players to plot out the action scenes before engaging them.

Once movement begins, a press of a button allows us to enter a slow-motion

'My Friend Pedro'

(Dead Toast Entertainment / Devolver Digital)
PC, Nintendo Switch

Price: $19.99

mode, where one can assign multiple targets or entertain some balletlike spins (spins, of course, evade incoming bullets).

In turn, "My Friend Pedro" asks us to rethink video game action, with moments of what would normally be cringe-inducing bloodshed turning into a grand dance.

Think of it like playing "John Wick," which itself is getting a hotly anticipated game with a team led by Mike Bithell, who developed the indie game "Volume," another title that emphasizes time-based gameplay.

Like "Superhot," these aren't games that tweak time as a gimmick; instead, "My Friend Pedro" wants us to make use of a full environment, twisting, gliding and spinning off walls, under lasers, on top of skateboards or through dream-like worlds with giant bananas.

So, about that banana. Lending "My Friend Pedro" either a more macabre bent or a more light-hearted one — perhaps depending on your own depravity — the "Pedro" of the game's title is actually a talking banana.

Pedro is essentially the instigator for all the action, telling us at the start that we've been kidnapped and aren't long for this world — unless we fight our way out.

Playing the game requires that we believe said banana, who tells us that a meat factory is essentially a front for gun smuggling. Yet Pedro's presence does lend a nagging, sinister backdrop to all this exquisitely designed action.

She was happy until birthday surprise

Dear Amy: My boyfriend and I have been dating for four months. Despite his affection and eagerness to see me frequently, I knew he was still seeing other people.

His birthday was about five or six weeks after we met — about 10 dates into our relationship. Instead of being with me, he went away for the weekend with some friends. When he came back, he wanted to start seeing me exclusively.

We moved in together a few weeks ago. This past weekend, I casually asked about his birthday weekend. Now that we are together, I was hoping he would tell me who he was with. He has been very open about his past relationships. But he refused to talk about it. He said no good could come from me knowing. I tried to explain to him that it was better for me to know the truth and move on than to wonder.

It is quite obvious that he went with another woman. Now I can't seem to let it go. I'm hurt that he didn't want to spend his birthday with me. I'm concerned that there was someone else that he cared enough about to spend his birthday with right before we became serious.

I love him and our relationship is otherwise healthy, so am I wrong to be hurt and questioning things? If so, how do I let it go?

— Ruminating in DC

Dear Ruminating: This relationship seems to have progressed at warp speed. If you had dated longer before cohabiting, this birthday date might not make you so bananas now. The first thing you should do is to make sure your STD tests are up to date. It seems logical that he was with another woman — likely for a previously scheduled special weekend/birthday trip that turned into a last-hurrah/breakup weekend — possibly someone he met after you two started dating.

Over his birthday, you two were still in the non-exclusive dating phase. You don't get to feel hurt. You do get to feel curious.

Your boyfriend seems to be in the driver's seat of your relationship. If he doesn't want to disclose or discuss this, and you don't want to move out, I agree with him that you should find a way to move on.

Dear Amy: My husband and I are parents of an only child. We love to travel as a family. However, my husband and I realize that as our son grows older, he may occasionally want to invite a friend along.

We are comfortable with this idea, but it has brought up some questions about the proper financial etiquette in such a situation. If we invited a pal, how much (if anything) should we be asking the guest (or, more likely, his parents) to pay for?

We would feel uncomfortable asking the guest to help pay for shared costs (hotel, gas, groceries, etc.), but what about tickets to attractions, significant meals out or airfare? We would hate to offend anyone by getting this wrong, but have no barometer.

— Wanderlust

Dear Wanderlust: If you invite another child to vacation with you, that child is your guest and you should pay for the child. That includes transportation, housing, food, tickets for attractions, etc. The child should be expected only to bring along "pocket money," for extras.

Many times, parents will respond to such generosity by offering to pick up some costs — or insisting on it. Then you can respond: "If you'd like to pay for Timmy's airfare, that would be helpful. Otherwise, he is our guest."

Grateful and thoughtful parents who can afford it will often give the child extra money to treat your family to an attraction or dinner, as an acknowledgment and thank-you. They might also find other ways to reciprocate, such as inviting your son along on one of their vacations.

But do not extend this invitation unless you are fully prepared to cheerfully pay for it.

Dear Amy: Regarding older people getting dogs, three days before turning 80, I adopted a 7-year-old dog. Best thing I ever did — for both of us.

That was over four years ago, and yes, I worry about what would happen if she outlived me, but both our lives have been enriched. I still work two days a week in the business office of a nursing home, and she comes to work with me, putting a smile on many faces, loved by everyone.

— Patricia

Dear Patricia: You're my hero.

Adler, WTTW celebrates the moon landing's 50th anniversary

BY BIANCA SANCHEZ

On July 24, 1969, four days after Buzz Aldrin and Neil Armstrong became the first two men to walk on the moon, then-President Richard Nixon hailed the week "the greatest week in the history of the world since creation." Now, half a century later, the Adler Planetarium has scheduled three days of celebratory programming that, despite not rivaling an actual moon landing, let alone creation, are still pretty out of this world.

Not to be outdone, WTTW-Ch. 11 Chicago has released the lineup for "Summer of Space." Here's a sampling of Adler events to attend and PBS programs to watch.

At the Adler

■ Chicago Moonshot Murals: In collaboration with local street artists, the planetarium has scheduled a series of public art experiences throughout the city. Three Chicago Public Library branches — West Englewood, West Lawn and Chinatown — invite community members to partake in coloring a 5-by-4 foot art canvas to illustrate the community's own "moonshot" idea. July 10, 2 p.m. at West Englewood

NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION

The lunar module, with astronauts Neil Armstrong and Edwin Aldrin Jr. aboard, approaches for a rendezvous with the Apollo 11 command module after the moon landing.

Public Library and 6 p.m. at West Lawn Public Library; July 11, 3 p.m. at Chinatown Public Library; July 20, 10 a.m. at the Adler Planetarium.

■ Adler After Dark: Moonshot: Don your best Don Draper and Peggy Olson looks, ladies and gents, for this nighttime, adults-only Adler After Dark. There will be themed drinks and music along with some of the unheralded stories of the 400,000 people who worked diligently to make Buzz and Neil's moonwalk a success. Thursday, July 18 (ages 21+), 6:30-10:30 p.m.

■ Moon Bash: This two-day museum extravaganza is for guests of all ages. Visitors can launch their own rockets, relive the Apollo 11 mission in virtual reality, enjoy one-day-only puppet shows, explore space artistry and chat with astronomers who worked on the Apollo 11 mission.

Participation in these programs are included in the general museum entry pass. July 19-20 during regular museum hours 9 a.m.-6 p.m.

■ Why go to the Moon? A Conversation on the Past and Future of Lunar Exploration: NASA has recently launched Mission Artemis to return to the moon by 2024. Space historian Roger Launius and historian of colonialism Margaret Huettl will lead a conversation on why America went to the moon in '69 and whether a return trip is necessary today. July 19, 7 p.m.

■ Fly Me to the Moon Yoga: Experience Vinyasa Flow, a modern-day form of classical Indian yoga, under the twinkling stars in Adler's Grainger Sky Theater. Crescent and moon puns will abound. July 20, 8:30 a.m.

■ To the Moon and Beyond: A Conversation with Jim Lovell and Beth Moses: Catch a conversation between Captain Jim Lovell, the Apollo 8 and Apollo 13 astronaut famously played by Tom Hanks in the 1995 film Apollo 13, and Beth Moses, chief astronaut instructor and commercial astronaut with Virgin Galactic, on all things lunar. A Q&A will follow. July 20, 2:30 p.m.

■ Project Apollo: A Commemorative Beer: In addition to the celebratory events, the Planetarium will offer a commemorative beer. Project Apollo, a partnership between Adler, Solemn Oath Brewery, Binny's, Omega Yeast, Country Malt Group and Hopsteiner will be sold at the Planetarium, Solemn Oath Brewery and local Binny's stores — a portion of the proceeds will support Adler's STEM programming.

On WTTW

Now that you know where to find your Project Apollo beer, here's some programs to watch once back home from the Planetarium:

■ "Chasing the Moon" is a three-part documentary special on the space race. July 8-10, 9 p.m. to 11 p.m.

■ "Antiques Roadshow: Out of this World" is a special edition exclusively featuring appraisals of space memorabilia. July 8, 8 p.m.

■ "Nova - Back to the Moon" is a new installment of the "Nova" series showcasing cutting edge scientific discoveries and NASA's latest plans to return to the moon. July 10, 8 p.m.

■ "The Planets" is a five-part series that delves deeper into the majestic beauty of our eight planets. Wednesdays beginning July 24, 9 p.m.

ALYSSA POINTER/CHICAGO TRIBUNE 2016

Nathson Fields, who was wrongly convicted of a 1984 double murder, leaves the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse in Chicago.

Chicago double murder featured on TV show

BY TRACY SWARTZ

Nathson Fields said he hasn't "received a dime" of the $22 million a federal jury awarded him in 2016 after he was wrongly convicted of a 1984 Chicago double murder.

"I still haven't received my award" from the city of Chicago, Fields says on Sunday's episode of the HLN series "Death Row Stories," which is scheduled to air at 7 p.m.

The former El Rukn gang member spent 18 years behind bars, including 11 on death row. Fields and Earl Hawkins were convicted and sentenced to death for the South Side slayings of Talman Hickman and Jerome "Fuddy" Smith, a leader of the rival Black Gangster Disciples' Goon Squad.

Fields was granted a retrial after Cook County judge Thomas Maloney, who presided over his bench trial, was convicted of accepting $10,000 to fix the case. The judge returned the cash during the trial when he suspected the FBI was onto the bribe.

Hawkins testified against Fields in the 2009 retrial, but Judge Vincent Gaughan said Hawkins was not believable. He acquitted Fields of both murders. Fields successfully sued the city, alleging that two Chicago police detectives falsified incriminating evidence and concealed favorable evidence. The case is now in the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, federal court records show.

Fields, 65, said he now works with Witness to Innocence, a group of death row survivors who are devoted to abolishing the death penalty. He said he was also able to connect with his daughter, who was born after he was arrested.

Fields' sister, Ruth; his attorneys, Candace Gorman and John Stainthorpe; former federal prosecutor Scott Mendeloff; and Torrence White, who said he heard gunshots in the 1984 double slaying, were also interviewed for "Death Row Stories."

Season 4 of the series — which is executive produced by Robert Redford, "Going Clear: Scientology & the Prison of Belief" director Alex Gibney and others — premiered last month. tswartz@tribpub.com

WATCH THIS: SATURDAY

Rami Malek

“Bohemian Rhapsody” (7 p.m., 11:35 p.m., HBO): Emmy winner Rami Malek (“Mr. Robot”) added an Academy Award, a Golden Globe, a Screen Actors Guild Award and a BAFTA honor to his mantle for his uncanny portrayal of Queen lead singer Freddie Mercury in this 2018 biographical musical, which also was a global box-office blockbuster. Director Bryan Singer was fired roughly two weeks before the end of principal filming, whereupon Dexter Fletcher completed the film. Allen Leech, Lucy Boynton, Gwilym Lee, Ben Hardy, Joe Mazzello and Aidan Gillen also star.

“2019 FIFA Women’s World Cup” (10 a.m., FOX): The 2019 FIFA Women’s World Cup is down to its final two matches. Today, Match 51 takes place at Allianz Riviera in Nice, Provence-Alpes-Cote d’Azur, France. It will be the third place play-off featuring England against either Spain or the Netherlands. Tomorrow’s final will be held at Parc Olympique Lyonnais in Décines-Charpieu, Rhône. In the 2015 World Cup, England defeated Germany to earn third place honors.

“Million Dollar Mile” (7 p.m., CBS): A former women’s college basketball player goes up against a medical student nicknamed “The Harvard Hammer,” who holds an All-American title, in the new episode “The Elite of the Elite.” Also, a self-taught gymnast goes for the gold against one of Russia’s leading stuntmen, the aptly named “Beast From the East.” Tim Tebow is host; Maria Taylor and Matt “Money” Smith provide color commentary.

“Trapped Model” (7 p.m., 11:01 p.m., Lifetime): Grace (Lucy Loken), an aspiring model, can scarcely believe her luck when fashion photographer Hunter Kelly (Wes McGee) offers to help launch her career in this 2019 thriller. She gets chilling insight into Hunter’s true objectives, however, when a photo shoot turns into a kidnapping. Hunter wants to use Grace as his next “star” on a sordid website, where his previous discoveries all eventually wound up dead. Kiki Harris also stars.

“The Possession of Hannah Grace” (8 p.m., 3:46 a.m., Starz): Dutch filmmaker Diederick van Rooijen’s 2018 horror flick stars Shay Mitchell (“Pretty Little Liars”) as Megan Reed, a troubled ex-police officer who finds herself at loose ends after recently completing a stint in rehab. To pay bills, she takes a gig as security officer for the graveyard shift in a morgue, where she begins to experience some really creepy incidents. Stana Katic (“Castle”) co-stars as one of Megan’s friends, a nurse.

“Supersize My Pool” (8 p.m., 11 p.m., HGTV): Families who are in dire need of a backyard makeover get thrilling news from host Mario Lopez: Their seen-better-days pools are about to be transformed into resort-style oases in this new home makeover series. Each episode finds Mario meeting with the homeowners to find out what features are on their fantasy wishlist (oversize grottoes and water slides, anyone?), then his team puts those dreams into reality.

Somebody spiked the punch at the club's Saturday night duplicate and the players were bidding a little wildly. Hard Luck Louie was feeling his oats when he bid to slam, but the contract had decent play. The opening heart lead went to dummy's queen, East's king, and Louie's ace. Louie ran the queen of spades at trick two and was quickly down one. East won with his king and returned a heart. "Both kings offside," said Louie. "Damn my luck!"

The bidding:

North	East	South	West
1♦	Pass	1♠	Pass
3♠	Pass	4NT	Pass
5♥	Pass	6♣	All pass

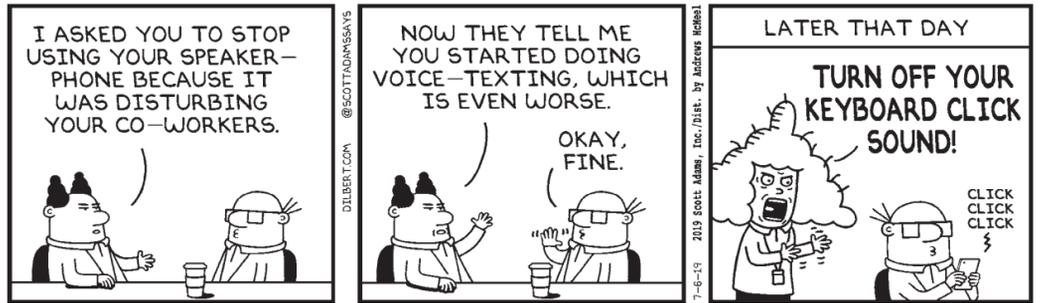

Opening lead: Jack of ♥

Lucky Larry was also feeling the joys, and he arrived in the same contract with the same opening lead. He also covered with dummy's queen and captured East's king with the ace. He led the queen of spades, just like Louie had done, but when West followed low, Larry rose with dummy's ace. He cashed the ace and king of diamonds and was a bit surprised when West showed out but didn't ruff. Larry ruffed a diamond, cashed the ace of clubs, and ruffed a club in dummy. Another diamond ruff, another club ruff, and Larry discarded his losing heart on one of dummy's established diamonds — making six!

Larry's line of play was far superior to Louie's. The king of spades might have fallen under the ace, or the diamonds might have split 3-2 with the king of spades in the hand with three diamonds. There are other layouts, in addition to this one, where Larry's line would have also worked.

As Cubs ponder trades, need must balance cost

BY MARK GONZALES

Change is coming to the Cubs. President Theo Epstein threatened to make changes if they don't improve.

But for now, the Cubs remain tied for first place in the National League Central despite a 22-28 record during a 52-day stretch.

Here are some factors to consider as they try to bolster their roster and regain their command of the division with the July 31 trade deadline approaching:

1. What are their needs? General manager Jed Hoyer said Monday the Cubs are looking at "everything."

But the cost of starting pitching while Cole Hamels recovers from a left oblique strain might be prohibitive. And the Cubs have enough internal options and days off to maximize their talent until Hamels returns — perhaps by

Draft picks fuel victory in opener

White's 17, Gafford's 21 help beat Lakers as summer play begins

BY K.C. JOHNSON

LAS VEGAS — A little more than seven months have passed since general manager Gar Forman first saw Coby White play in person.

Four miles down the road from White's Bulls summer league debut Friday night, Forman watched the then-North Carolina guard light up Texas and UCLA to the tune of a combined 52 points, 11 assists and 11 3-pointers on successive nights.

That's when Forman, to use John Paxson's words, "blew up" Paxson's cellphone with text messages raving about White.

White finished with 17 points, three assists and three turnovers in the Bulls' 96-76 victory over the Lakers at the Thomas & Mack Center on the UNLV campus.

But some of the same attributes that created Forman's initial excitement and eventually led to the Bulls drafting White at No. 7 last month were on display.

The speed pushing the ball upcourt. The shot-making. The confidence.

White threw an alley-oop pass that second-round pick Daniel Gafford — who had 21 points, 10 rebounds and four blocks — dunked for the Bulls' first basket and then swished a 19-foot jumper on his first attempt. The Bulls started Shaq Harrison, recent two-way contract signee Adam Mokoka and Chandler Hutchison alongside the draft picks, and

BEST BEARS PLAYERS EVER

Bortz's play always spoke at high levels

Our pick at No. 62, Mark Bortz, was a former defensive lineman who became a sturdy left guard for 11 years in the 1980s and early '90s. He didn't say a lot, but he did make two Pro Bowls. Page 2

RANKING THE BEST BEARS PLAYERS EVER

#62 Mark Bortz

Converted defensive tackle became stalwart at left guard for 11 years

BY WILL LARKIN

Mark Bortz didn't say much. He didn't need to. The Bears and their opponents knew he was one guy you just didn't mess with.

As Bears offensive line coach Tony Wise told the Tribune's Don Pierson on July 19, 1994: "I'm not saying he's the toughest man in the world. But there couldn't be too many tougher."

Ten years earlier, center Jay Hilgenberg told Pierson: "Bortz is tough. He's the kind of guy that if you blindside him, you might hurt yourself."

Bortz made a name for himself among his coaches and teammates in 1984, when in his first year as the starting left guard, he held his own against Cowboys All-Pro defensive tackle Randy White. So frustrated was the "Manster" about the odd feeling of being neutralized that he snapped the next time he saw Bortz.

During a preseason game the next year, a fight broke out between the Bears offensive line and the Cowboys defensive line. White removed Bears tackle Keith Van Horne's helmet and hit Bortz on the head with it.

Pierson got both sides of the skirmish in the Aug. 27, 1985, game story.

"At least he was nice enough to not hit Van Horne," Bortz said of his bareheaded teammate, who had squared off with Ed "Too Tall" Jones earlier in the game.

"I didn't want to hit anyone," White responded. "But Bortz pushed me and I just reacted."

For the Bears and their coach, the "Bortzilla vs. Manster" battle showed they had someone who could go toe-to-toe with the NFL's nastiest players. Bortz cracked a rib during their initial battle but didn't miss a play.

"Mark is not awed by anybody," Mike Ditka told Pierson. "He plays as hard as he can as long as he can. And he has great strength."

Bortz came to the Bears as a defensive tackle from Iowa. He was part of the team's incredible haul from the 1983 draft, when Ditka, general manager Jim Finks and scouts Bill Tobin and Jim Parmer added what quickly became the core of the 1985 Super Bowl champions.

Bortz, a two-time Pro Bowl selection, was part of one team's best-ever eighth round with Hall of Fame defensive end Richard Dent.

The Bears also drafted Super Bowl starters Jimbo Covert, Willie Gault, Mike Richardson, Dave Duerson and Tom Thayer and signed Dennis McKinnon as an undrafted free agent.

In 2015, Tobin told the Tribune's Brad Biggs that during the scouting process, Iowa coach Hayden Fry said he had regrets about not making Bortz an offensive lineman.

"That stuck in my mind because he was a damn good Big Ten player," Tobin said. "He was tough and aggressive and smart and down to earth and he had some size."

Tobin said that after the draft, Ditka informed offensive line coach Dick Stanfel that he would be tasked with making Bortz an offensive lineman.

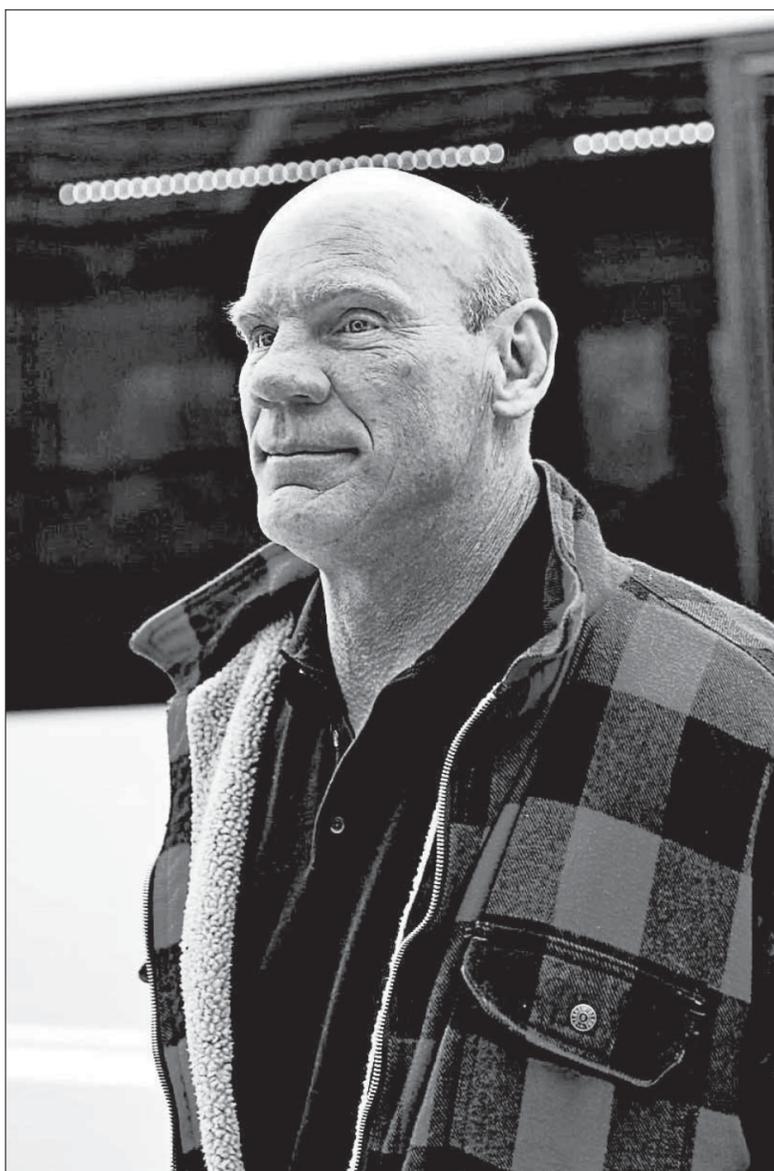

"By golly if he didn't and put him in the Pro Bowl," Tobin said. "All the credit goes to Dick, thanks to Hayden."

Bortz learned to play the O-line as a rookie in 1983, then replaced Noah Jackson as the starting left guard in '84. Blessed with strong hands and precise feet, the 6-foot-6, 280-pound Bortz became one of the best trap blockers in the league.

"Gets those hands on you and it's all over," Bears defensive lineman Dan Hampton told Pierson.

Covert, Bortz, Hilgenberg, Thayer and Van Horne stayed together as the starting line for seven seasons from 1985 to '91. Bortz was the last one standing, holding down left guard for 11 years.

On Dec. 30, 1988, the Tribune's Bob Sakamoto asked 20 Bears to name one player as the team's leader. Mike Singletary was the runaway winner with 15 votes, but

CHRIS SWEDA/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Mark Bortz started at left guard for 11 years on an offensive line that helped the Bears win Super Bowl XX.

1983-94 | 12 seasons | 171 games

Bears record: 119-72 (.623).

Playoff appearances: 8; Super Bowl champion in 1985.

Acquired: Eighth round (219th overall pick), 1983 draft from Iowa.

Hilgenberg voted for Bortz.

"He lays it all on the line," Hilgenberg said. "He is very determined and won't back down from anybody. Our defensive linemen hate going against him in practice because Bortz is always jacking them up."

The Bears made the playoffs in Bortz's last season, 1994, allowing him to set the team record with 13 playoff games. He missed the last four games of that season with a sprained right knee but battled back to block for field goals and extra points in the wild-card win against the Vikings. Back spasms prevented him from playing a 14th playoff game, as he missed the blowout loss to the eventual champion 49ers.

After getting his spasms checked out more extensively in the offseason, Bortz was forced to retire after team doctors discovered a debilitating condition. A bad back ended his career, just as it had for Covert and Thayer.

"My back has got some major problems," Bortz told the Tribune's Fred Mitchell on Feb. 10, 1995. "I don't understand all of the medical stuff, but it didn't look good."

Bortz's reaction was typically understated. He never said too much, especially about any injury he happened to be suffering.

In John Mullin's 2003 book, "Tales from the Chicago Bears Sideline," former teammate Tom Waddle said Bortz "would never acknowledge that he was hurt. He had too much pride and was too tough a guy. He didn't say a lot. He just kind of grunted."

Covert told Mitchell: "He was always there. He took on the best and played great. He played against a lot of great players at that position, and I never saw him get dominated."

Bortz grew up in tiny Pardeesville, Wis., where he was the youngest of seven brothers and the starting center for a state-qualifying basketball team. An avid outdoorsman, he often invited teammates on hunting and fishing trips; Hilgenberg was impressed after seeing Bortz pull himself to the surface after falling through ice while fishing.

Now 58, Bortz makes his home in western Illinois on a farm near Liberty, a small town about 30 miles east of Quincy.

He never minded not getting more attention for his valuable contributions to the Bears.

"A lot of guys get caught up in the publicity of it all," Bortz told Pierson. "It always kind of amazed me, some guys when they go out to eat and nobody recognizes them, they're offended. I'd rather nobody recognizes me."

Draft picks fuel Bulls in opener

Harrison had five steals. The Bulls won despite shooting 1-for-20 from 3-point range.

For Hutchison, it marked the second-year forward's first action since he fractured the sesamoid bone in his right foot Jan. 25. He looked fluid running the court and more muscular than during his rookie season.

Harrison dominated defensively early with four steals in just more than 7 first-quarter minutes, picking up where he left off with his impressive regular-season finish.

Here's the obligatory pause for perspective: Marquis Teague averaged more points at his first summer league than Derrick Rose.

In other words, summer league is less about statistics and more about experience.

"We've had guys over the years who have been juniors and seniors in college who come in and summer league can be difficult," Paxson said at a June 24 news conference to introduce the draft picks. "You can struggle with the newness of the game and all that is thrown at you. Our goal is to put them in the best position to succeed. We just want them to work hard, try to learn, try to get better. Everything else will take care of itself."

"We're not going to judge anything on what happens in the next week or couple weeks through summer league. We just want them to learn and grow. This is part of the process of getting them ingrained in this organization."

That said, there's something about a debut. Friday marked the first time White and Gafford wore a Bulls uniform for an organized game, summer league or not.

It's a memory they'll always have. For White in particular, it's not one he envisioned because he didn't plan to be a one-and-done college player.

"It hasn't really sunk in for me yet. I'm still in awe," White said.

4 in City Series focus: Maddon, Giolito, Schwarber, Jimenez

1. The Mad Hatter: Maddon exploded like an M-80 on the Fourth of July at PNC Park, charging out of the Cubs dugout and screaming like a banshee in the general direction of Pirates manager Clint Hurdle before being held back by Kris Bryant and umpire Joe West.

The issue was high-and-tight pitches to Javier Baez, but most figured Maddon was trying to get ejected to fire up his players and end a weeklong malaise.

It's not exactly a novel idea, as Cubs fans know well.

Former manager Lou Piniella erupted in a game on June 2, 2007, one day after Carlos Zambrano and Michael Barrett fought in the dugout. Piniella went out to argue a call with third-base umpire Mark Wegner, kicked his cap in the air several times and kicked dirt on Wegner's shoes before crew chief Bruce Froemming restrained him.

"The umpire was correct; the guy was out," Piniella said. "I was going to argue whether he was out, safe or whatever. It didn't make a damn bit of difference."

The Cubs lost the game but went on to win the National League Central, with Mt. Lou's eruption seen as the turning point.

"The fans enjoy a good argument," Piniella once told me. "I remember when I first started managing, (Yankees owner George) Steinbrenner told me: 'Your main job is to win, but your second job is to help put fannies in the seats. So when you get out there with an umpire and get thrown out, just put on a show.'"

Maddon put on a fine show and performed a perfect spin-o-rama to get away from West.

Whether his feud with "Clinton" (as he called Hurdle) will pay dividends remains to be seen, but Full Metal Maddon was a great way to get on the front page of the sports section.

2. Gio or bust: Giolito makes his final start of the first half Saturday, facing his Cubs veteran Jon Lester. He is the first pitcher to finish last in the majors in ERA and make the All-Star team the next, and he's seemingly one of two potential All-Star starters along with Astros ace Justin Verlander.

With an 11-2 record and 2.72 ERA, he has been the bright spot of an otherwise abysmal rotation. Outside of Giolito, Sox starters are a combined 15-29 with a 6.19 ERA. Hopefully the arrival of top pitching prospect Dylan Cease will change things in the second half.

Giolito is coming off a win over the Twins in which his outing was shortened to five innings by a rain delay. He was upset with his previous outing in Boston, which he called "unacceptable." There are no moral victories in his mind, and he's always accountable for his performances, never looking for excuses.

"At this level, it's part of the job," he said. "You have to be a good self-evaluator and you have to hold yourself accountable for mistakes."

"It's just part of our team. We're going to stay on each other, we're going to stay on ourselves most importantly and learn from our mistakes and come back the next day."

3. Schwarbombs away: Kyle Schwarber has provided the Cubs with a new look at the top of the lineup, hitting 13 home runs with a .523 slugging percentage in 45 games in the leadoff spot.

But he's hitting only .239 with a .320 on-base percentage when batting first, which doesn't bode well for a long-term stay there. With an overall .185 average with runners in scoring position, Schwarber also needs to perform better in clutch situations, which could be said of most of his teammates.

4. Eloy's joie de vivre: Is anyone having more fun on the Sox than Eloy Jimenez, who offered a fan his glove Thursday afternoon when he ran to the stands and couldn't make a catch?

The joy of Eloy has been on display all season, and now he's becoming more outgoing as he's starting to show the power we all knew was coming.

Since June 8, when he hit a 471-foot home run in Kansas City, Jimenez has nine homers and 22 RBIs with a .979 OPS.

"It's been the same as always," he said. "Same swing. It's just now I have more games (played)."

Jimenez hit the game-winning home run in the ninth inning of the first City Series game at Wrigley Field and would like to bookend it with another big performance at Sox Park.

Reliever Sean Doolittle could be a great acquisition but is likely unavailable as the Nationals have surged back into contention recently.

Cubs' status on deals

the first half of August.

The most obvious needs are left-handed relief and a seasoned utility player.

In past seasons, the Cubs have added speedsters such as Quintin Berry, Leonys Martin and Terrance Gore. But those acquisitions occurred before the Aug. 31 second trade deadline, which no longer exists.

2. Who's available? The name of Sean Doolittle of the Nationals has flashed like a neon light since May. Same for Will Smith and Tony Watson of the Giants.

Left-hander Brad Hand, whom the Cubs scouted last summer before he was dealt from the Padres to the Indians, could be available again.

The Cubs addressed two needs two years ago with the acquisition of backup catcher Alex Avila and left-hander Justin Wilson (now with the Mets) from the Tigers, who remain in a rebuild mode.

Luis Avilan rejoined the Mets after a two-month stint on the injured list because of a left elbow injury, so he could serve as low-cost insurance if he's healthy and as effective as he was in 2017 with the Dodgers.

Manager Joe Maddon has spoken often about a midseason acquisition needing to be a significant improvement to maintain clubhouse harmony, but Epstein and Co. possess the final say on trades.

Should the Cubs simply try to add another quality right-handed reliever, Kirby Yates of the Padres, Sam Dyson of the Orioles and Mychal Givens of the Orioles deserve consideration.

For all the criticism the Cubs received for dealing Eloy Jimenez and Dylan Cease to the White Sox for left-hander Jose Quintana, they shouldn't shy away from considering versatile Leury Garcia.

3. What do those targets' contracts look like? The Nationals are in the thick of the NL wild-card race, so Doolittle appears destined to stay. Hand will earn $7 million in 2020, plus a $10 million option with a $1 million buyout in 2021. Watson's contract includes a $500,000 player buyout if he doesn't pick up the $2.5 million option for 2020.

The Cubs' 40-man roster currently has no wiggle room, and they could rely heavily on reinforcements from within their organization. Carl Edwards Jr., who has been effective against left-handed

Struggling Cubs still in it

BY MARK GONZALES

The Cubs viewed their 22-28 record during the just-completed stretch of 50 games in 52 days in two ways.

"We're all lucky no one has run away with this thing," manager Joe Maddon said, referring to all five National League Central teams entering Friday within 3 1/2 games of each other.

However, third baseman Kris Bryant said, "I look at it as if it could have been a lot better too. We still have (two) games left in the first half and could have finished much stronger considering we gave some games away.

"That's the most frustrating part of it. You look at those games (the Cubs lost), and we could have easily won those. I don't know why or the exact reason, but it's still frustrating."

Thursday's 11-3 win over the Pirates provided temporary relief as the Cubs snapped a four-game losing streak and were 5-for-12 with runners in scoring position. That helped erase the stench from Wednesday's 6-5 loss, in which they committed two mental blunders and blew a lead in the ninth.

They also ran the bases aggressively hitters, could be activated from the injured list in time for Saturday's game against the White Sox.

Reliever Allen Webster recently started a minor-league rehab assignment and possesses a sharp slider. Left-hander Danny Hultzen's fastball has been clocked at 97 mph at Triple-A Iowa, but he is on the injured list and must prove he can remain healthy before he's considered for a promotion.

A firm commitment from Ben Zobrist on returning could lessen the need for an experienced hitter while helping the Cubs' younger hitters, who call him "Bennie Pro."

4. Which Cubs are expendable? This might be the time for the Cubs to trade a member of their current 25-man roster to address a need.

Left-hander Mike Montgomery's undefined role has affected his performance, and he might be better suited for another organization if the Cubs feel strongly about

Thursday, and Jose Quintana provided a big shutdown inning in the fifth after his teammates scored five runs.

"I wouldn't say we weathered the storm," reliever Brandon Kintzler said. "I'd say we got tested. We didn't pass very well. But other teams didn't play well, so we got lucky and we don't have too much of a gap. We're a good team, and as soon as things start clicking, we can take off."

Pitcher Kyle Hendricks said the Cubs must maintain a narrow vision against the White Sox before the four-day All-Star break.

"When you're not playing well, you have an opportunity every day to turn it around," said Hendricks, who will pitch the first-half finale Sunday.

Extra innings: Right fielder Jason Heyward should return Saturday after missing the last two games because of soreness in his back and hip. ... The Cubs will need to make a roster move to make room for reliever Carl Edwards Jr., who is expected to be activated from the injured list after throwing a scoreless inning in his second rehab appearance Thursday for Triple-A Iowa.

Adbert Alzolay and Tyler Chatwood as contenders for their 2020 rotation.

Mark Zagunis, Carlos Gonzalez and Robel Garcia have had stints with the major-league team, but Ian Happ remains stuck in Iowa. Montgomery's and Happ's stock isn't high, but the Cubs might need to cut their losses if they see an upside to a similar talent in another organization.

The Cubs have been unafraid to deal top prospects Gleyber Torres, Jimenez and Cease in deadline deals. Signing two catchers during the international free-agent signing period raises curiosity as to what top catching prospect Miguel Amaya could fetch in a deal.

"We have a lot of prospects who have taken a big step forward, no doubt," Hoyer said Monday. "So I certainly know we have plenty of assets that other teams have asked about."

"We're certainly not where we were in 2015 (in terms of prospect depth), but I feel things are on the upswing, and we feel good about the progress we made."

Madrigal, Robert faces of next White Sox wave game. When they told me I'd be going out, I was really excited and humbled to be able to represent the White Sox."

Madrigal and Robert are key parts of the next wave of talent in the Sox farm system. Robert is the top-rated prospect in the organization and Madrigal is No. 4, according to MLB.com.

"Both Luis and Nick are progressing very well," general manager Rick Hahn said last week. "In terms of where we had hoped they would be over the course of the '19 season, I'm not sure we could ask for much more. They both, essentially in their first full professional season given Luis' injury issues last year, have made it to Double A at a young age and are both performing very well."

Madrigal, the fourth pick in the 2018 draft out of Oregon State, is batting .313 with 14 doubles, two homers and 38 RBIs for Class A Winston-Salem and Double-A Birmingham. He recently earned Sox minor-league co-Player of the Month honors for June with Steele Walker.

"I finally tried to embrace what kind of hitter I am, a gap-to-gap hitter, rather than trying to do too much at the plate and hit fly balls," Madrigal said. "I've really tried to perfect what style of play will most benefit me at the plate. When I think about more line drives and hitting the ball hard on the ground, I tend to do better. So that's something I've picked up over the last couple years."

The Sox promoted Madrigal to Birmingham on June 6. He has a .383/.462/.484 slash line in 24 games with the Barons.

"I really don't think it's been that much of an adjustment," Madrigal said of the move to Double A. "The first thing I noticed getting up here, the strike zones are a little bit smaller. They kind of benefit the hitter."

"Even on defense, it's kind of amazing how small the zones are, and I know going up levels they're only going to get smaller. That's one big thing I noticed and kind of tucked in the back of my mind, definitely when I'm hitting, is that the zones are a lot smaller here."

Madrigal has also noticed how much fun it is to watch Robert.

Robert has a .349 average with 15 homers and 51 RBIs at Winston-Salem and Birmingham. He is hitting .314 with seven homers and 27 RBIs in 55 games with Birmingham.

"It's pretty incredible to see," Madrigal said. "Whether it's on the basepaths, in the outfield, at the plate, you just see how special a player he is. One at-bat will go by and he'll look fooled at the plate, and the next one he'll be on every single pitch."

"He makes adjustments on the fly. And it's fun hitting behind him. It seems like he's always on base with a chance for him to score every time I'm up."

WHITE SOX TAKEAWAYS

Arrow up for Cease, Abreu, Yoan

Taking 2 of 3 from Tigers provides several bright spots

BY LAMOND POPE

Here are four takeaways from this week's rain-shortened series at Guaranteed Rate Field, in which the White Sox won two of three against the Tigers.

1. Dylan Cease made a strong first impression. Fans lined up near the Sox bullpen to catch a glimpse of Cease warming up before his big-league debut Wednesday.

"It was incredible," Cease said of the reception. "Even when I walked out pregame, they were lined up from third base all the way behind the bullpen cheering. That much energy definitely helps me lock in and is pretty cool too."

The prized prospect rebounded from a shaky first inning to earn the victory in the first game of a doubleheader.

Cease walked three batters and hit another on the way to allowing two runs in the first. He settled down and struck out six while allowing three runs and four hits in five innings of the eventual 7-5 win.

"When he came into the dugout (after the first inning), if you looked at his facial expressions, you could see he was a little flustered with himself," manager Rick Renteria said Wednesday. "But still under control. (Pitching coach Don Cooper) spoke to him a little bit, (catcher James McCann), they were having conversations between innings. Reinforcing certain things and he handled himself very well."

Cease said some of the early issues with fastball command were more physical than mental.

"I didn't really feel out of control at all," he said. "I felt very relaxed and calm, so it was really more just physical."

Advice from Sox ace Lucas Giolito also helped.

"I came in and said: 'My fastball is cutting. It looks like a Wiffle ball. What advice do you have for me?'" Cease said. "(Giolito) said to get my direction going toward the plate, and I was able to do that and lock back in."

Renteria did not have a date set for Cease's second start. The Sox are in the process of setting up the rotation for the second half of the season.

2. Jose Abreu showed why he's an All-Star. Abreu provided the heroics in the second game of the doubleheader, hitting a game-winning three-run homer in the 12th.

The All-Star had two hits in Wednesday's first game and two more in the second game, including the game-winning blast to give the Sox a 9-6 victory. Abreu is tied for first in the American League with 63 RBIs.

"He's always been a guy that shows you by example, his preparation, how he works, the things that he does," Renteria said.

Abreu saw the doubleheader sweep as a sign of good times ahead for the Sox.

"We have a lot of talent here, young guys," he said through an interpreter Wednesday. "That's something that made me realize I'm very blessed being here in this organization. I want to be part of this organization going forward because I know we are going to be very, very good and I think you can see that right now."

Abreu is slated to be a free agent at the end of the season.

"If I would be the owner, I would sign myself here," he said with a smile. "Hopefully, yes, I want to stay here."

3. Yoan Moncada displayed his power. Speaking of clutch, Moncada extended Wednesday's second game in the 10th with a solo homer to tie the score at 6-6.

Moncada had two homers and three RBIs in the second game. It was his third multi-homer game this season, and he became the 10th Sox player to homer from both sides of the plate in the same game.

Moncada is second on the team with 16 homers behind Abreu's 20.

"He's definitely growing and improving in all facets," Renteria said. "You're starting to see both sides of the ball, too, having impact. He's gaining more experience, continuing to grow up, continuing to improve."

4. Reynaldo Lopez hopes to benefit from the All-Star break. The Sox hoped for length out of Lopez on Thursday after using most of their bullpen during Wednesday's doubleheader.

But Lopez allowed four runs in the sixth, including a two-run homer to Niko Goodrum, and exited after another tough outing. He surrendered seven runs (six earned) and nine hits in 5 1/3 innings of the 11-5 loss, and his 6.34 ERA is the highest in the majors among qualifying pitchers.

Lopez vowed that he'll be better in the second half. Renteria believes the All-Star break will help.

"Anybody who has ever gone through a little bit of a spell that's difficult, stepping away from it doesn't hurt," Renteria said. "Sometimes you don't have the luxury of stepping away and have to keep grinding. In either case, hopefully it's a benefit to him."

Coco Gauff starts the celebration after a comeback victory in the third round.

WIMBLEDON

Gauff showing what's possible

Third-round victory by 15-year-old offers a view of her potential

By HOWARD FENDRICH

Associated Press

WIMBLEDON, England — It was easy to forget that Coco Gauff is still just 15 as she stood on the grass of Centre Court, pounding her chest and shouting, "Let's go! Come on!" to celebrate a 32-stroke point that forced a third set in her match Friday evening at Wimbledon.

Up in the stands, Mom rose to pump a fist and yell, "Yes!" Thousands of spectators jumped out of their seats, too, roaring. By then, Gauff already twice had been a point from losing in the third round to Polona Herczeg of Slovenia.

Most players, no matter the age, would not be able to find a path past that kind of a deficit on this imposing a stage, would not be able to handle that sort of stress and figure out a way. Gauff is, quite clearly, not most players. That much has been established. How far can she go, both this fortnight and in the future? The tennis world is watching, waiting to learn the answers.

That Gauff, ranked 313th and facing another unseeded player, was scheduled to appear at Wimbledon's main stadium says plenty about what a sensation the Floridian already is. That she won this one, and how she did — erasing a pair of match points and coming back to beat the 28-year-old Herczeg 3-6, 7-6 (7), 7-5 — offer some insight into what Gauff might become.

"Right now, I'm just super-relieved that it's over," Gauff said. "I always knew that I could come back, no matter what the score is."

As it is, Gauff was the youngest player to qualify for Wimbledon in the professional era, winning three matches last week against higher-ranked women in the preliminary rounds.

Then, by upsetting five-time champion Venus Williams, who is 39, in the first round of the main event, Gauff became the youngest woman to win a match at the All England Club since 1991, when Jennifer Capriati reached the semifinals at 15.

That was followed by a win against 2017 Wimbledon semifinalist Magdalena Rybarikova, who is 30.

Herczeg, who is ranked 60th, and is now 0-4 in third-round matches at majors. Next up: A fourth-round matchup against 2018 French Open champion and former No. 1 Simona Halep, who eliminated two-time major champ Victoria Azarenka 6-3, 6-1.

The top half of the men's draw, meanwhile, saw more in its series of upsets, leaving defending champion Novak Djokovic with what seems like little resistance in his road to the final. The No. 1 seed got a brief test Friday before quickly righting himself and getting past Hubert Hurkacz 7-5, 6-7 (5), 6-1, 6-4. No one else on that side of the bracket is ranked higher than 17th; that's the spot held by Milos Raonic, who is also the only other player who ever has been to a Grand Slam final.

Those exiting Friday included last year's runner-up, No. 4 Kevin Anderson, who was knocked off by No. 26 Guido Pella 6-4, 6-3, 7-6 (4). Pella beat 2017 runner-up Marin Cilic last year at Wimbledon and now will face 2016 runner-up Raonic, who beat Reilly Opelka of the U.S. 7-6 (1), 6-2, 6-1.

No. 10 Karen Khachanov, No. 11 Daniil Medvedev and No. 19 Felix Auger-Aliassime all lost.

"It's impossible to say who is going to figure things out more than the others to do what it takes to win Slams," Anderson said.

That could be said of Gauff, of course, but she sure is looking like someone who can go far in the coming years.

She has a big serve, dialing it up to 118 mph on Friday — only Herczeg and Serena Williams have hit one faster this week — and good groundstrokes off both wings, along with some touch and guile. And what she possesses, above all, is some real calm amid a storm.

"We've been working on her poise all year," Gauff's father, Corey, said earlier in the week. "After that comes together, then you really can improve your game, because when you're poised, you're not that emotional. You can troubleshoot."

IN BRIEF

Golf: Bryson DeChambeau dominated the second round of the 3M Open, racking up nine birdies in a career-low 62 to vault into the lead with a 14-under-par score halfway through the first-time PGA Tour event at the TPC Twin Cities in Blaine, Minnesota. Adam Hadwin arrived in the clubhouse in second place at 12 under. ... Zander Lombard shot a 3-under 67 to take a one-shot lead after two rounds of the Irish Open in Lahinch. Eddie Pepperell endured cool, rainy conditions to shoot 67 and was 8 under. ... Sung Hyun Park made nine birdies in an 11-hole stretch on her way to a 10-under 62 and a one-shot lead over Monday qualifier Yealimi Noh at the Thornberry Creek LPGA Classic in Oneida, Wisconsin. Park, coming off a victory in Arkansas that returned her to No. 1 in the world, was at 17-under 127.

NFL: Former Patriots linebacker and ESPN analyst Tedy Bruschi is recovering in a Massachusetts hospital after suffering a second stroke. His family said in a statement the 46-year-old suffered the stroke Thursday and immediately recognized the warning signs. The family said he was "recovering well."

NHL: The Penguins announced that they signed coach Mike Sullivan — who guided the Penguins to championships in 2016 and 2017 — to a four-year contract extension that runs through the 2023-24 season. The terms of the new deal will kick in when Sullivan's current contract expires at the end of the upcoming season. The 51-year-old Sullivan is 174-92-34 with Pittsburgh since taking over for Mike Johnston in December 2015. ... The Blue Jackets resigned restricted free agent defense-

NASCAR

Daytona set to enter a new era

On-track product takes more competitive turn

By JENNA FRYER

Associated Press

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. — The midpoint of the NASCAR season is here, making one last holiday weekend run at its birthplace, trying as always to deliver a white-knuckled thrillfest on the high banks of Daytona International Speedway.

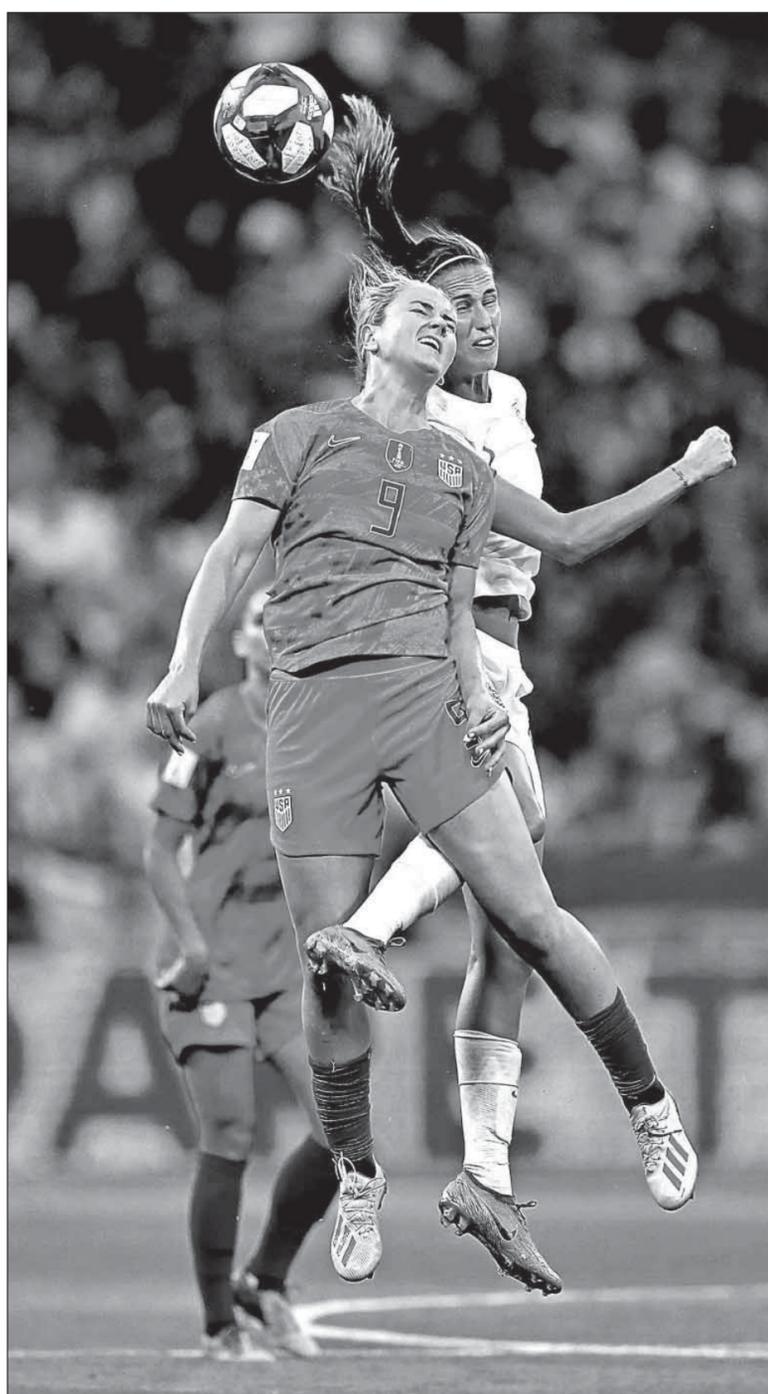

The series is riding a high into Saturday night's race following Alex Bowman's first career Cup victory last week and a new rules package that NASCAR leadership believes has immensely improved the on-track product.

"It's been an extraordinary year," said Steve Phelps, who took over as president of NASCAR late last season. "I think the racing product has been exceptional. By and large, the fans are incredibly excited about what they see."

The numbers support Phelps' assertion that the racing is indeed more competitive than it was this time last season, when Kevin Harvick, Kyle Busch and Martin Truex romped over the competition during a summer stretch in which the three could not be beaten. There have been 602 green-flag passes for the lead in 17 races, up from 383 at this point last year. The average number of lead changes is nearly 19 per race, up from 15.88, and four races this season have produced record-setting green flag passes for the lead.

Conversely, though, there have been just seven winners this season, with the lion's share of the checkered flags going to Joe Gibbs Racing and Team Penske. Gibbs drivers have

WOMEN'S WORLD CUP

It's more than just one game

Horan hopes US success can boost women's soccer at home and around world

BY ANNE M. PETERSON
Associated Press

LYON, France — Midfielder Lindsey Horan hopes the attention on women's soccer and the United States' run at the World Cup boost the professional league back home.

The National Women's Soccer League is in the midst of its seventh season and has been more successful than any other attempt at a pro women's league in the United States. But the NWSL has seen recent struggles with slow growth, a need for sponsors and a lack of television exposure.

Horan, who plays for the NWSL's Portland Thorns, hopes the league experiences a World Cup bump — both for the rest of this season and beyond. She'd like the league to see the success of the Thorns, who average crowds of around 17,000 a game.

"Hopefully it grows, hopefully we get more teams, and more people buy into us and realize how important it is for the women's game — and that our NWSL gets better and better so we can get better for our national team," she said.

The league got some positive news earlier this week when ESPN announced it will televise 14 matches this season, the network's first NWSL broadcasts since 2014. Eight games will be broadcast on ESPN News and six on ESPN2, including both semifinals and the championship on Oct. 27.

The NWSL and A+E Networks terminated their broadcast agreement in February, leaving the league with no TV partner. Last season, a game aired each week on the Lifetime channel. A+E surrendered its stake in the league, but Lifetime remains a jersey sponsor.

"I was pretty annoyed that we didn't have a (television) deal at the beginning of the year. It almost felt like we were going backward," Horan said. "So I think this should have come a while ago, but I'm very happy that it did."

But it's not just the NWSL. Horan would like to see women's soccer lifted globally in the wake of the World Cup. The defending champion U.S. national team plays the Netherlands on Sunday for the title.

"Hopefully everyone sees this around the world and everyone sees what the women's game is turning into and how much exposure we're getting. You've seen the numbers throughout this World Cup, how many people are watching, how many people we were getting at the stadiums," she said. "And hopefully, clubs and owners and everyone sees that."

FRANCOIS MORI/AP

Lindsey Horan says that in addition to team goals she would like to see women's soccer lifted globally in the wake of the World Cup.

Following high school, Horan headed overseas to play in France for Paris Saint-Germain for several years. She moved back to the United States to join the Thorns in 2016. Fellow Thorns Tobin Heath, Emily Sonnett and goalkeeper Adrianna Franch are also on the U.S. squad in France.

National team players are allocated across the league's nine teams and U.S. Soccer pays their salaries.

Horan, who has 74 appearances with the national team and 10 goals, came off the bench for the team's first two knockout matches between Spain and France before starting in the 2-1 U.S. semifinal victory over England. She served Alex Morgan the go-ahead goal.

"I think after the semi I was very emotional, that's because this has been everything a little girl's dreamt of, and that goes for everybody on the team," she said. "I think at that moment we won and the whistle was blown it was so surreal and all the emotions kind of came out. Now it's just realizing this is real and now we still have a final to go push for. This tournament's not over."

Horan jokes that because of her time in France she's the best French speaker on the team, throwing a bit of shade at Alex Morgan, Megan Rapinoe and the others who have also played for club teams in France.

She's clearly having the time of her life. "Absolutely," she said. "I think this obviously has been the best experience of my life. Playing in a World Cup and doing as well as we've done, it's been absolutely amazing."

SATURDAY, JULY 6

NORMAL HIGH: 84°

NORMAL LOW: 63°

RECORD HIGH: 103° (2012)

RECORD LOW: 46° (1983)

A weekend break from heat and humidity

LOCAL FORECAST

HIGH 78 LOW 66

■ The morning starts cloudy and humid. Showers possible, especially in the morning.

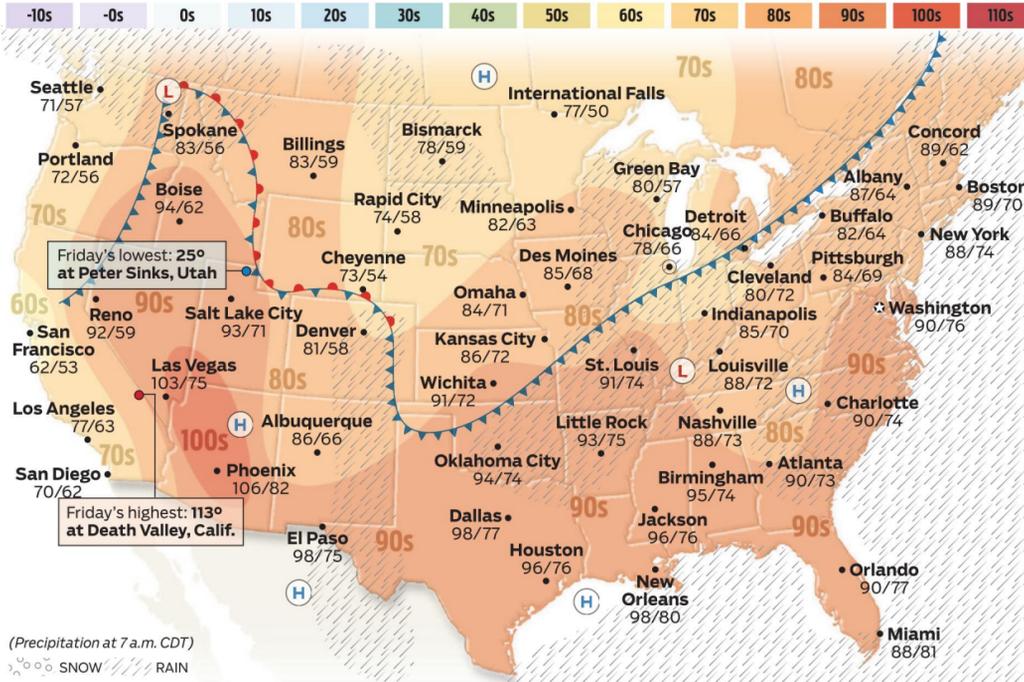

■ Partial clearing in the afternoon. Breezy NNE winds 12-20 mph with gusts to 25 mph help lower the humidity.

■ Temperatures in the upper 70s but only in the 60s at the beaches.

■ Clearing cooler and much less humid overnight. Low in the mid 60s but slightly cooler lakeside.

■ NE nighttime winds subside to 10-15 mph.

NATIONAL FORECAST

Friday produced the fifth day with a high temperature reaching 90 or more at O'Hare International Airport. The temperature at Midway also reached 90 on Friday, for the eighth time in 2019. Through July 5, O'Hare has had three 90-degree days for the month, roughly half of the monthly normal (5.9 for July).

The heat and humidity will take a break this weekend, with high temperatures reaching only the mid- to upper 70s, with even lower temperatures near Lake Michigan. The high temp on Monday will also be below normal.

The break will end Tuesday, when the temperature again approaches 90. High humidity and an increased chance of thunderstorms will be in place by Wednesday.

Overall, the week will be relatively dry compared with what we experienced in April through June.

SUNDAY, JULY 7

HIGH 76 LOW 64

Mostly sunny, dry, pleasant. High in the mid 70s but closer to 70 near the lake with NNE winds 10 to 15 mph. Mainly clear overnight with a low in the mid 60s. Nighttime winds will be light from the northeast.

MONDAY, JULY 8

HIGH 80 LOW 64

High pressure centered over the Great Lakes helps keep clouds from forming. High near 80. Cooler at lake with east winds 5-10 mph. Partly cloudy overnight with a low in the mid 60s. Light east winds turn southeast.

TUESDAY, JULY 9

HIGH 88 LOW 68

Partly cloudy skies early. Increasing clouds in the afternoon. Warmer. High approaching 90. Humidity increases. SSE winds 4-8 mph. Cooler lakeside. Showers at night. T-storms possible. Low in upper 60s.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 10

HIGH 92 LOW 69

Breezy hot, humid. Showers and t-storms likely. High in low 90s. West winds 5-10 mph with gusts to 15 mph. Chance of showers and t-storms diminishes during evening. Winds diminish and turn WNW. Low near 70.

THURSDAY, JULY 11

HIGH 86 LOW 64

Slight chance of an early morning shower. Cooler, less humid. High in mid 80s, but cooler at lake. A cold front passes bringing breezy north winds. High pressure keeps skies mostly clear overnight. Low in mid 60s.

FRIDAY, JULY 12

HIGH 85 LOW 69

Mostly sunny and warmer as humidity increases. High pressure settles over the corn belt. Light SSW winds. High in the mid 80s. Partly cloudy with a nighttime low in the upper 60s. Light SW winds overnight.

NOTE: Predicted high/low temps on Tribune weather page are chronological—the "high" refers to maximum reading expected during day and "low" is the minimum reading expected the following night.

ASK TOM

Dear Tom,
What is the latest date Chicago has had snow?
— Mark Shaeffer

Dear Mark,
Snowflakes have flown in the air in Chicago as late as June. It was just a trace, but snow was officially recorded in the city on June 2, 1910, when the temperature was a very un-June-like 44 degrees. Chicago weather historian Frank Wachowski tells us snow — more accurately, wet snowflakes — occurred during a thunderstorm that also brought rain, hail and total precipitation of 0.41 inch on a chilly day when the high/low temperatures were 55/43 degrees.

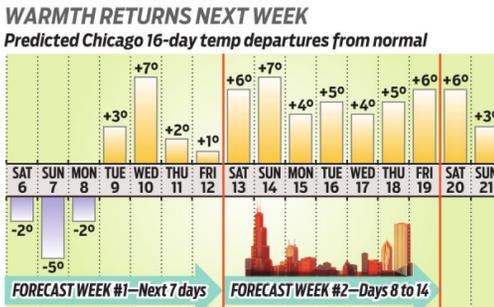

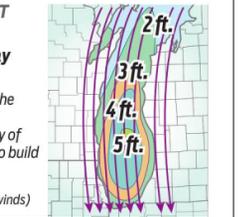

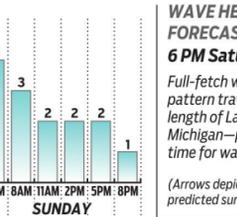

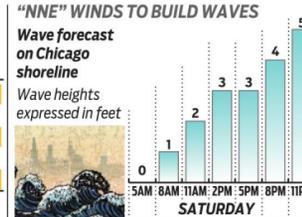

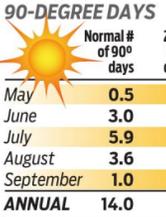

Virtually all of Chicago's snow occurs between October and May, but traces of snow have also been recorded in September. Thus, the city has received snow in 10 months of the year. July and August stand apart as Chicago's only absolutely snow-free months.

Philip Yenyo, left, executive director of the American Indians Movement for Ohio, talks with an Indians fan before a game against the Detroit Tigers in 2015 in Cleveland.

BENCHED

Chief Wahoo not All-Star this time in Cleveland

BY TOM WITHERS | Associated Press

CLEVELAND — An hour before the first pitch of a series opener against Kansas City, a steady flow of fans stream into the Indians' team shop at Progressive Field to buy new All-Star merchandise and other Cleveland gear — some bearing his unmistakable smiling face.

Chief Wahoo still plays here.

The Indians' fiercely debated logo and longtime mascot — a shameful racist figure to some, source of civic joy to others — is no longer on the field, but he hasn't completely gone away. He appears to be as visible as ever.

While Major League Baseball and the Indians mutually agreed in 2018 to completely remove him from the team's jerseys and caps as well as banners and signage in the ballpark starting this season, when Cleveland hosts the All-Star Game for the sixth time, the red-faced, toothy caricature remains omnipresent across town.

Look on the concourses and in the seats and Wahoo is on caps, jerseys, T-shirts, hoodies, tank tops, jackets and even baby clothing. For just $10, a red foam Wahoo finger can be yours.

In some ways, he seems more popular.

"We can only hope," said Richard Stevens of Rochester, New York, who did a little pregame shopping with sons Jesse and Zac.

"I was very sorry to see it go," Jesse said.

Not everyone shares that view.

There are Native Americans who have fought for decades to eliminate Chief Wahoo and wish the Indians would change a nickname they feel mocks their proud culture.

"The team still doesn't understand," said Philip Yenyo, executive director of the American Indian Movement of Ohio. "They're still profiting off of us by being racists."

But unlike in 1997, when Cleveland last hosted Major League Baseball's best players and Indians catcher Sandy Alomar became a hometown favorite with a go-ahead home run in the seventh inning while wearing a grinning Wahoo on his left shirt sleeve, the contentious symbol won't be on display to the world Tuesday night.

Not between the lines at least.

Wahoo may no longer be a symbol on the field, but he's still got status.

"I miss him," said John Adams, who has given the Indians their baseball heartbeat by pounding a bass drum for the past 45 seasons from high in the outfield bleachers. "It's an emblem that we take pride in — pride in Cleveland. And the fact that wherever you saw him, you didn't even have to ask.

People would look at Chief Wahoo, and they would go, 'Cleveland.' And that's anywhere in the world."

Adams' stance is shared by many Clevelanders who felt MLB Commissioner Rob Manfred's push to eliminate the contentious chief following the 2016 postseason was heavy-handed.

Manfred and Indians owner Paul Dolan agreed something needed to be done, when Wahoo's likeness, which appeared on the All-Star logo when the game was previously held in Cleveland, led to a court battle in Canada and a glaring national spotlight in the World Series.

On the eve of Game 3 of the AL Championship Series, an indigenous group asked the Supreme Court of Justice in Toronto to block the Indians from using its nickname or Chief Wahoo on Canadian TV, arguing they were offensive and discriminatory. The court rejected the request and dismissed the case, but the sensitive situation induced the need for action.

Then, during Cleveland's appearance in the World Series against the Chicago Cubs, Manfred went further than any previous MLB official by acknowledging the Wahoo logo was "offensive to some people, and all of us at Major League Baseball understand why."

Manfred's comment led to substantive discussions with Dolan and a joint announcement in January 2018 that the cartoonish figure was "no longer appropriate for on-field use." The Indians said their decision to keep selling Wahoo gear was to protect the club from losing ownership of the trademark.

The agreement to strip Wahoo from the team's caps and jerseys — but still allow his likeness to be manufactured and sold on merchandise — was seen by critics as a concession by the Indians, who were perhaps afraid of losing their All-Star bid by being defiant.

Both sides claimed the decision had no impact on Cleveland's choice to host the event, but it would be hard to imagine the Indians keeping it if they had refused Manfred's request.

There are still fans angry the Indians buckled. They feel part of their past has been stolen.

"I miss him because he was an icon," said Kristi Upperman of Lake Milton, Ohio, sporting a blue "Wahoo TrueTil The Day I'm Through" T-shirt while waiting in a concession line. "I think the world is too sensitive. It's not derogatory to any race or any nation or any ethnic group. It's a baseball mascot. And I think that nowadays everybody is too sensitive and taking things a little bit too far. Everything is too politically correct and it's driving me crazy."

She's not alone.

"It's just the way society is," said Jesse Stevens, a red-billed Wahoo cap perched on his head. "Wa-hoo's still out there. But MLB forcing it out, I think is stupid."

That kind of talk pains Yenyo.

For the past 25 years, he and other protesters have gathered on opening day outside Progressive Field, demanding the team change a logo and nickname they find demoralizing.

Yenyo said the move to take Wahoo away was a "positive step, but not enough."

"We're still hoping for more," said Yenyo, adding protesters have been subjected to more hostility

"We're still hoping for more. People feel like we've taken away part of their childhood, part of their memories. But if your memories are wrapped around a racist symbol, what kind of memories are those?"

the past two years. "People feel like we've taken away part of their childhood, part of their memories. But if your memories are wrapped around a racist symbol, what kind of memories are those?"

An Indians spokesman said the organization is not considering a change of the team's nickname.

There will not be any protests during All-Star events next week because Yenyo and others in his movement will be out of town taking part in various American Indian ceremonies across the country.

One day, he hopes to meet Manfred, who he said hasn't returned any calls.

"I just hope I could sit down with him and talk about this like adults," he said. "We can resolve this."

The Rays are looking into getting away from Tropicana Field for half of the season, potentially splitting games with Montreal. But many roadblocks remain before that can happen.

Rays dread this road trip

Plan to split season with Montreal has obvious downsides

BY MARC TOPKIN
Tampa Bay Times

ST. PETERSBURG — A key to success for Blake Snell is to keep things simple, on the field and off.

So while he's gotten little official information about the Rays' radical plan to split home games between Tampa Bay and Montreal starting in 2024, the Cy Young award-winning pitcher has heard, read and picked up on enough to have some significant concerns about the impact.

"This is some stressful stuff that Blake doesn't like thinking about," he said. "Blake just wants to throw the baseball."

The Rays have a long list of people they have to sell on the plan, starting with St. Petersburg Mayor Rick Kriseman. Because of the team's use agreement with the city to play all home games at Tropicana Field through 2027, Kriseman has to give permission to the Rays for them to even start working on details, which include building two new open-air stadiums.

They also need a stamp of approval from Montreal investors, government, business and political leaders in both markets and the players union and MLB owners.

Of course, at some point, they'll need to get their players to buy in, even if many they have now won't still be around when they become professional snowbirds. (Or, for branding sake, SnowBirds?) Getting Wander Franco on board may be more important than Willy Adames. But if the Rays get the requisite permissions to proceed with exploring the plan, and it inches (centimeters?) closer to reality for 2024, the level of conversation, and consternation, in the clubhouse will quickly increase.

"To have two different homes is kind of a lot of stress on the player," said Snell, who this spring signed a five-year deal through 2023. "Playing half in St. Pete and half in Montreal, would just feel like a whole season of road games? What if I have my dog in St. Pete? What about people with wives and kids?"

"It just seems like a lot of work. And just way more work for the player than anything. I just don't know. Honestly, it seems like a lot."

The initial framework of the plan is for the Rays to move spring training back to the Tampa Bay area and play the first 35 or so of its 81 home games there, then move north by early June for a second opening day and play the remaining three-plus months based in Montreal. Specifics of how, which is what some players ask about when the plan is brought up, haven't been disclosed, or maybe even worked out.

Rays pitcher Blake Snell is concerned that playing half the team's games in Montreal "would just feel like a whole season of road games."

Would the Rays get some kind of unusual in-season break in the schedule, such as two-three days off, for the move?

Would the team hire movers to pack, transport and set up the players' stuff while they were on a road trip? What about their families? Their cars?

How many days in advance of the move, while they're playing games that count, would they have to start dealing with the details? Who, even though many make millions, would pay for the move? Would they be expected to stay in a Montreal hotel at first then move into apartments or rental houses? Would there be a team trip in the spring or on an off-day to find places and sign leases?

And that's apart from questions about differences in tax rates, currency, language, medical care and more.

"It just sounds like a lot of concessions," said veteran pitcher Charlie Morton. "As someone with a family, I could see how that could be really difficult. Not just that it would be two different cities, but very far apart in an entirely different country."

Morton, 35, has played for five big-league teams and eight in the minors before that, and was traded once in-season, which is how this move would seem, except for the whole team. Yet Morton said he has always felt part of the community where he was playing (even if he was only there during the season), and wonders how that would be impacted by the split-city plan.

"You have that running through your veins, so to speak," he said. "You become proud of becoming part of those communities."

There is also a comfort in having a home base during the hectic season.

"Familiarity affects performance, to me," said Morton, signed through 2020, with a 2021 option. "You go to these cities and you're just trying to figure out the basics of the area, how do I get around, what are good places to eat, what are the routes to take? As human beings, we're always programming ourselves to become very familiar with our surroundings."

"When you go to a place that you don't know, you have these thoughts and emotions and reactions to everything that's going on around you."

Outfielder Tommy Pham was concerned about the expenses of the move, especially for the players making around the MLB minimum, currently $555,000. There is no question the players would have to "adjust" beyond what any others have faced, said center fielder Kevin Kiermaier, signed through 2022 with a 2023 team option.

"It's different. It's a different plan," Kiermaier said. "And that's not a compliment or throwing shade."

Kiermaier, who lives year-round in Tampa and said he understands why fans who "put their heart, soul money and time" into the team are upset, said he isn't, yet anyway, going to get too concerned about the details. Neither is infielder Brandon Lowe, though he could be impacted since his new contract has options through 2026.

"It's so far in the future, I haven't really worried about it at all," Lowe said.

Pham, who has criticized the Rays' lack of fan support before, thinks something has to change, so despite the logistics maybe the split-season idea is the answer.

"When you have a market like this where you have a team of our caliber and we're second to last in attendance, it's problematic," said Pham, a free agent in 2022. "I can understand if we're losing, but we're not. Back to back seasons, we're on a pace for 90 or more wins. Our owner is doing everything like the (recent special) $2 tickets. ... This is a way to provide the franchise with more revenue to go out and get more players. So I understand their reasons behind it."

Snell, who is from Seattle, said he greatly enjoys living and playing in the Tampa Bay area but knows the team needs a new stadium and would like resolution. Preferably without the stress of a mid-season move.

"I don't really care where I play as long as we have a good crowd and it's fun," he said. "I'm a bigger fan of pick one or the other — whatever y'all want to do, I just want to play. Wherever I play at, that's for them to decide. . . But a split thing, that's tough."

Volvo's 2019 V60 wagon handles storms like a champ

Our plane landed in Denver just past midnight. It was April and blizzard season wasn't done yet. Snow fell thick and heavy.

My wife, my daughter and I packed our gear into a new 2019 Volvo V60 station wagon and set off for Copper Mountain, where 13-year-old Skye was entered in the half-pipe at snowboarding's annual national competition, where Olympic hopefuls compete.

But first we had to get through the blizzard intact. The snowstorm formed weird, disorienting patterns that turned the windshield into some kind of video game, at times completely obscuring my view of the road. Hands gripped tight on the wheel, I prepared for the worst, the ladies blissfully asleep. Yes, I should have checked into an airport hotel to safely spend the night.

While I questioned my own judgment, the car never gave me cause for concern. Volvos are designed in Sweden, and the Swedes know winter. The all-wheel-drive V60 handled the snowy road and icy curves with aplomb. Best known for safety, Volvos are loaded with the latest driver-assist technologies as standard.

That includes Run-Off Road Mitigation, which detects when a car is about to leave the road and uses the steering and brakes to put it back on path. I never had to use it, but I was glad it was there. We reached Copper Mountain safe and sound.

I was predisposed to like the V60, newly designed for 2019. My family had tried out the bigger, cushier, more expensive V90 wagon last year, on a winter trip to Mammoth Mountain and Lake Tahoe. It was a hit — though at $70,000, far beyond our price range.

This V60 version — the "Momentum" — came in at $47,000. Still spendy, but any sports-oriented individual or small family who wants the versatility of a crossover SUV but prefers the superior road handling of a lower-to-the-ground wagon should give it a look. The base model starts at $38,000. The high-end "Inscription" model can reach the low $60,000s.

The next day, roads plowed, the weather clear, we got ready to take it for a spin. My daughter ran her hand over the seats and the fabric on the doors, the two-tone leather-wrapped steering wheel, in soft black and cream. "It's so ... aesthetic!" she said. The materials are high-quality, the look is clean but not stark. Quite a departure from the awful interiors Volvo put out when it was owned by Ford, before Chinese automaker Geely bought it in 2010.

Thomas Ingenlath, now chief executive of Volvo's electric brand, Polestar, and formerly Volvo's head designer, told me later that the company's aim is to create interiors "that are minimalist and functional, but also Scandinavian, with a sense of warmth, the feeling of a Scandinavian living room."

ANOTHER LOOK: VOLVO V60 T6 MOMENTUM

Times' take: Handsome all-weather station wagon
Highs: Sporty drive, comfortable seats, safety features
Lows: Hard-to-fathom infotainment system
Vehicle type: Five-passenger small wagon, four doors and a hatch
Base price: $38,900; Price as tested: $46,195

Powertrain: 2-liter 4-cylinder gasoline engine, super- and turbocharged
Transmission: 8-speed automatic, all-wheel drive
Horsepower: 316
Torque: 295 pound-feet
Estimated fuel economy rating: 21 mpg city / 31 highway / 25 combined

Even the roof carrier drew oohs and aahs. "Man that is one sleek box," my daughter's snowboard coach said, running her hand along its glossy black surface, a high-quality plastic treated to resist fading from the ultraviolet rays of the sun. The box fit four snowboards with ease. An anti-skid pad kept the boards from shifting around. The inside is illuminated with LED lights. And the station wagon let me load and unload the cargo without having to climb up on the open-door floor of the car, like I have to do with our own SUV. It all comes at a premium price, though — $1,445 for the box and $285 for the rails to mount it on.

The rear passengers said there was plenty of room. Volvo used a few tricks to add a few more cubic inches for knees and cargo, including thinner, but still comfortable, backrests on the front seats. When the rear seats are folded down, the headrests automatically retract, adding a few inches more.

Volvo had engineered its wagons for a sporty ride, and the V60 didn't disappoint. Steering is precise, cornering is excellent. Some reviewers have said the ride can be a bit stiff, but I'll take a little stiffness for more precision any day.

The base V60, with front-wheel drive, comes with a 2-liter, 4-cylinder engine that turns out 250 horsepower. Our version was fitted with a supercharger and a turbocharger that pushed the horsepower up to 316. The supercharger kicks in at lower speeds, the turbocharger at higher. An Edmunds review complained that the two sometimes went out of sync at maximum speeds. I didn't drive fast enough to see for myself; I had a kid in the car.

My wife took the wheel. She liked the sporty drive and visibility, especially in a relatively small car. "A lot of new cars, you just can't see well, especially out the back," she said.

I was perplexed, though, when she added, "This car is made for women!" She elaborated: "The way it's sized, it's very comfortable. It's not made for a big fat guy."

She's right about that. I'm 5-foot-11 and 180 pounds and I had plenty of room — in the driver seat, in the passenger seat, in the back. But if I grew a couple more inches and another 20 pounds, the car would probably seem a bit tight.

After a week with it, that's about the only bad thing I can say about the V60 — that guys who buy their clothes at Big & Tall stores might find it cramped.

Oh, and the infotainment system. I'll say something bad about that. It's about as frustratingly over-complicated as all the other infotainment systems out there. Worse, actually. Volvo knows it. They're working on basing future infotainment systems on the new Android Automotive Operating System, which allows the use of Google Maps and Google's voice-recognition system without having to use your phone. (Although you will still be able to connect your phone and use Android Auto or Apple CarPlay.)

My daughter did fine in the half-pipe. She did not place, but her coach said she did well enough to keep practicing and try again next year. By then the 2020 V60s will be out. They'll include a new Cross Country version with more height to push through piled-up snow. There will also be a limited edition plug-in hybrid version developed by Polestar that lifts horsepower up to 412. And maybe they'll have the tunes and other infotainment fixed by then too.
