

Huffman gets 14 days in prison

Actress also fined $30,000 in college admissions scandal

By COLLIN BINKLEY
Associated Press

BOSTON — “Desperate Housewives” star Felicity Huffman was sentenced Friday to 14 days in prison for a bribe to rig her daughter’s SAT scores and she tearfully apologized to the teenager for not trusting her to get into college on her own. “I was frightened, I was stupid, and I was so wrong,” Huffman, 56, said as she became the first parent sentenced in the college admissions scandal that ensnared dozens of wealthy and well-connected parents.

Fifty-one people have been charged in the scheme, the biggest college admissions case ever prosecuted by the Justice Department. Prosecutors said parents schemed to manipulate test scores and bribed coaches to get their children into elite schools by having them labeled as recruited athletes for sports they didn’t play.

In sentencing Huffman, U.S. District Judge Indira Talwani noted the outrage the case has generated, adding that it “isn’t because people discovered that it isn’t a true meritocracy out there.” The outrage, she said, was because Huffman took steps “to get one more advantage” in a system “already so distorted by money and privilege.”

Prosecutors had sought a month in prison for Huffman, while her lawyers said she should get probation.

Gurnee teen suing Juul

Alleges false marketing aimed at adolescents

By CINDY DAMPIER

Last week, as Adam Hergenreder huddled under a blanket in his hospital bed, recovering from a lung illness brought on by vaping, he offered a warning for his peers: Vaping “will mess up your lungs.”

Friday, in the offices of a downtown law firm, Hergenreder and his mom, Polly, both wearing black T-shirts with the message “Stay safe, don’t vape,” announced that they’ve taken their message one step further, filing a lawsuit in Lake County against Juul Labs Inc. and a Waukegan gas station where Adam bought vaping products.

The 82-page complaint, filed Friday by attorney Antonio Romanucci, follows one brought by Lake County State’s Attorney Michael Nerheim on behalf of county residents, alleging that Juul has used false marketing claims to create a public health crisis. Hergenreder’s lawsuit makes similar allegations, asserting that he fell victim to false marketing efforts that were specifically engineered to target teens.

“Juul has turned a generation of adolescents into addicts and recklessly put the health and safety of young men and women like Adam in jeopardy,” said Romanucci, “inflicting illnesses upon them that medical personnel and public health authorities have yet to understand the causes of or the long-term impacts of.”

Hergenreder is one of 52 Illinoisans affected by a vaping-related lung illness, which the Illinois Department of Health said is responsible for one death in the state so far. Though much remains unclear about the illness, including its exact cause, attorneys are seeking compensatory damages for Hergenreder, based in part on his lung injury.

Though the extent of damage to Hergenreder’s lungs may remain unclear for years, Romanucci said that one thing is certain: “Juul should be held responsible for deliberately targeting him and millions of other American teens with wildly irresponsible claims that its products are safe.”

Juul Labs, which is owned by the conglomerate Altria, also the owner of old-school tobacco giant Philip Morris, said in a statement, “Our product has always only been intended to be a viable alternative for the one billion current adult smokers in the world. We

An original deed, beautifully penned in cursive, proving another relative, John Wesley Snowden, owned land in Montgomery County, Maryland, in 1899. Bundles of photos that span seven decades.

For an hour, Snowden Ingram parted with her treasures, placing them in the care of on-site archivists, who scanned and digitized her photos and documents onto a USB flash drive for safekeeping.

“This history is important,” Snowden Ingram said. “It’s who we are.”

Snowden Ingram brought a 1941 wedding-day photo of her mother, Christine Wright Snowden, to be digitized.

The DuSable Museum is offering free digitization and preservation services to Chicago-area residents through the Community Curation Program, a traveling initiative launched by the Smithsonian Institution’s National Museum of African American History and Culture to preserve the stories and artifacts of black communities around America.

“Part of the beauty is looking at these local narratives and the local migrations and specific themes that dominate black life in an area,” said Doretha Williams, program manager for the project. “People bring in

Mementos of gunshot victims to fill memorial that opens at Cultural Center next week

Two Chicago women whose sons were shot to death will help unveil a project next week that speaks to the spate of killings that has wracked the city and the nation — a memorial to victims of gun violence.

Annette Nance-Holt’s 16-year-old son, Blair, was killed in 2007 as he was riding a CTA bus home from his South Side high school. A year earlier, Pamela Montgomery-Bosley’s 18-year-old son, Terrell, was gunned down in a South Side church parking lot as he helped an unload drums from a car.

On Wednesday, the mothers inserted personal belongings representing their sons into the memorial, which consists of four small houses, each painted white. Within the honeycomblike walls are brick-shaped openings where artifacts can be placed and viewed from inside and out.

Without tears, Nance-Holt inserted her son’s orange lanyard from Julian High School, his last high school photograph and a CD he made, a symbol of his desire to be a musicians’ business manager.

have never marketed to youth and do not want any non-nicotine users to try out products." The company also touted its "action plan to combat underage use," including technology it is implementing at retailers to make it harder to buy the products without a valid ID.

In its announcement of the lawsuit, Romanucci's firm noted statistics that show a rapid increase in e-cigarette use over the past three years: CDC data shows that from 2017 to 2018, e-cigarette (or vaping) product use increased from 11.7% to 20.8% among high school students and from 3.3% to 4.9% among middle school students — an increase of 1.5 million more youth users of e-cigarettes in just one year.

That rapid rise, the lawsuit alleges, is due to the company's marketing, which touted Juul as a safer alternative to smoking, and positioned it as catnip to teens, using young models and creating flavors that made highly addictive nicotine sound like candy. Juul said that it has now discontinued selling fruit and dessert flavors at retail stores (they are still available online) and the company has filed patent infringement claims against manufacturers and sellers of copycat pods that still come in sweet flavors.

According to the lawsuit, Hergenreder, who began vaping at age 16, bought Juul products at The Gas Stop convenience store in Waukegan — which sports a "Cigarette Drive-Thru" and is also named in the lawsuit — without ever being asked for identification. He liked sweet flavors like mint and mango, he said.

When he started, the lawsuit says, Adam did not know that Juul contained nicotine. At one point, he was using up to 1.5 pods of nicotine vaping liquid every other day and eventually started vaping THC.

Hergenreder's claim and others like it mark a return to the language of the 1990s lawsuits against big tobacco companies, which resulted in a huge nationwide settlement that requires the major tobacco companies to pay substantial penalties to 46 U.S. states each year to offset the public health crisis brought on by smoking.

Joelle Lester, Director of Commercial Tobacco Control Programs for the Public Health Law Center, a Minnesota-based organization that aims to help communities combat tobacco use, said she's not surprised to see the return of anti-tobacco litigation in response to e-cigarettes. Though she noted that individual cases such as Hergenreder's "are a little bit different than the huge cases filed by attorneys general in the 1990s, a lot of signs point to a repeat pattern here."

Lester has hope that cases such as Hergenreder's can be immediately successful, however, unlike the early cases of anti-tobacco litigation. "Those early attempts were unsuccessful," she said, "and those litigants were completely overwhelmed by the companies' campaigns of misinformation." Over time, the long history of the tobacco companies' active role in obscuring the real effects of smoking were revealed, changing public perception and resulting in success in court for anti-smoking cases. "The industry worked so hard to create doubt," said Lester, "and that dragged out litigation for decades. It took all those lawsuits, whistleblowers, journalism — all of that is what brought all of this to light. And it took all that to counter the campaign of misinformation, for people to see how bad these bad acts were."

Those cases, she believes, have done more than provide a legal road map for cases against vaping companies; they've also provided context for the public and, potentially, an accelerated timeline. "Those cases did so much to change the public perception of what these tobacco companies were up to. It will be interesting to see, will people think they have to wait 30 years to fully understand the consequences, or will they say we know enough to act now? It will be interesting to see how juries interpret all of that."

Romanucci confirmed he is following the path laid down by anti-tobacco cases. "There is no question that I think we're on the cusp of launching a similar type of litigation, but here's the great benefit that we have: I think we can stop this one before it becomes way too late. I think we have an opportunity to save literally hundreds of thousands of lives if not millions by being able to put a brick on this product and make it evaporate. Let's make it go away!"

With equal calm, Montgomery-Bosley tried to find the right place for a tiny diorama she had made to represent her son's life — a picture of Terrell, a copy of his driver's license, a football, a church, a Bible, and miniature drumsticks and a guitar that reflect his love of music.

The mothers, who sparked the creation of the memorial, want their sons and other victims of gun violence to be remembered as people — not as anonymous statistics or parts of the daily drumbeat of death that fills airwaves, websites and the pages of newspapers.

"Art tends to make people think deeper than just a story on TV or an article," said Nance-Holt, who last year became the first woman in Chicago to hold the post of first deputy fire commissioner.

The memorial, which will honor gun violence victims around the U.S., is likely to be one of the most talked-about displays when the third edition of the Chicago Architectural Biennial, a sprawling contemporary architecture and design exhibition, opens Thursday.

And it is timely, with Congress debating proposed gun control measures after the back-to-back August mass shootings in El Paso, Texas, and Dayton, Ohio, that shocked the nation.

Designed by the Boston office of the MASS Design Group, which won acclaim last year for its memorial to victims of lynching in Montgomery, Ala., the Chicago project is a prototype that its architects hope will evolve into a permanent display. So far, about 165 artifacts have been gathered at events in Washington, D.C., and Chicago.

The objects, which will be displayed in each of the four houses, include the bow tie of a man killed in the 2016 shooting at an Orlando, Florida, nightclub that took 49 lives. There are also expected to be artifacts from elderly rural men who committed suicide. Suicides account for nearly two-thirds of gun deaths, according to Everytown for Gun Safety, a gun control group that also worked on the memorial. By showing objects from a wide range of victims, the architects are challenging the narrative that gun violence is solely confined to young African American men who belong to gangs.

Their approach draws inspiration from the AIDS Memorial Quilt of 1987, whose colorful homespun panels — adorned with names, hearts and other symbols of victims — drew attention to the magnitude of the AIDS crisis and helped to humanize its victims.

Gun violence is "an epidemic. We have to be able to wrestle with the complexity of it," said Michael Murphy, the founding principal of the MASS Design Group. (The acronym stands for Model of Architecture Serving Society.)

Organizers will have to be careful, he acknowledged, that those honored are innocents, not gang members responsible for killings who later were killed themselves.

Named the Gun Violence Memorial Project, the memorial will likely draw criticism from gun-rights advocates. In the past, they have argued that the on-going violence in Chicago, where hundreds of homicides are recorded annually, shows that gun control laws don't work.

The memorial's creation began last year when Nance-Holt and Montgomery-Bosley, co-founders of an advocacy group called Purpose Over Pain, attended the dedication of the lynching memorial.

From the roof of the low-slung building hang 800 weathered steel columns, each etched with the name of a lynching victim. Murphy and the MASS Design Group were the architects.

The women approached Murphy after hearing him speak at a breakfast following the dedication.

"We told him we need something like that in Chicago — to bring attention to our children and the violence that's taking place," said Montgomery-Bosley, who oversees a youth group at the Rev. Michael Pfleger's St. Sabina Church.

Last summer, the women helped organize events in Chicago where families and friends of gun violence victims could bring belongings representing their dead loved ones.

On Wednesday, as construction workers hammered the memorial's rafters into place, the women saw their vision turned into reality.

"Once the artifacts are placed in there, it's going to be overwhelmingly powerful," Nance-Holt said.

The display for each victim will include a small acrylic panel with the name of the dead, date of birth and date of death. Recordings of remembrances from victims' families will be played. A nearby wall will contain explanatory material. Visitors will be able to enter the houses, each of which has two doorlike openings.

In keeping with the experimental spirit of the biennial, which is part of a nonprofit organization of the same name and the city's Department of Cultural Affairs and Special Events, the memorial is — and will continue to be — a work in progress.

The original design called for the artifacts to be housed in individual glass bricks. But there was concern that the heavy bricks would damage the marble floor tiles in Randolph Square, the first-floor gathering space of the Chicago Cultural Center, the biennial's headquarters. Glass bricks also proved too costly. So the architects decided to cover the wood honeycomb with glass sheets.

The architects also are making arrangements for families to bring in objects to the Randolph Street lobby of the Cultural Center, whose northern entrance is at 77 E. Randolph St. Other cities, like Boston, could also host collections, said Jha D. Williams, a senior associate at the MASS Design Group.

There is space for many more artifacts to be added.

The architects designed each house to have precisely 700 openings, Williams said. That represents the number of Americans who are killed by guns in an average week, according to Everytown for Gun Safety.

After the biennial closes Jan. 5, the memorial or a part of it will appear next year in another temporary venue, an exhibition about the MASS Design Group at the National Building Museum in Washington, D.C.

Eventually, the architects hope, the temporary displays will lead to the creation of a permanent national memorial to victims of gun violence.

The goal, Murphy said, is to prevent the "flattening of all these lives into spreadsheets and numbers, which only reinforces the erasure of their history and their individual identities."

The mothers who sparked the development of the memorial view it as a catalyst.

"We're hoping that this opens the conversation about gun violence and illegal guns in the hands of people who shouldn't have them — how it devastates families and communities, and the trauma that's left behind," Nance-Holt said.

"I'm glad they put it in the center of Chicago," Montgomery-Bosley said. "Everyone can come downtown and see this exhibit that represents our children. They were human beings. They wanted to be something."

Zone restrictions come for area by Bronzeville bridge

BY JOHN BYRNE

Bronzeville residents fed up with parking shortages and late-night parties outside their homes, thanks to a nearby pedestrian bridge connecting their block to the lakefront, should soon have new summer regulations in place to make it tougher for outsiders to leave their cars nearby.

Ald. Sophia King, 4th, said she wanted to try to strike a balance between letting people use the public street to get to the bridge over Lake Shore Drive near 41st Street and addressing the concerns of people who live on Oakenwald Avenue near the western side of the bridge.

The City Council Transportation Committee on Thursday approved an ordinance to create an overnight permit parking zone on the block during warmer months.

"There's really not a buffer from where the bridge meets the ground on that side to their homes just across the street," King said. "We want to give people a chance to access the lakefront, but also respect the people who live right there, who didn't sign up for this when they moved in. Parking has been a problem, and the partying in the later hours has been an issue as well."

Under the proposal, which will head to the full City Council, only cars with permits will be permitted to park on Oakenwald between 40th and 41st streets between 5 p.m. and 6 a.m. from April 1 to Nov. 1. As with the city's year-round permit parking program, residents will be able to get permit stickers for their cars and for guests.

Anyone will be able to park on the east side of the street during the day, but there will be no parking permitted by anyone on that side overnight, King said.

She said she wanted to address this particular situation, while honoring the 4th Ward tradition of not restricting street parking with the kinds of permit parking zones that cover densely populated neighborhoods in much of the rest of the city.

"This is like, 'We get home from work while people are enjoying the park, we still live here, we want to be able to park,'" she said. "And we want people to know, listen, during the workweek, we're working, we live here, kind of respect that."

Man charged in death of fire lieutenant's son

BY LIAM FORD

A man charged with stabbing to death the son of a Chicago Fire Department lieutenant in June had been upset in the days leading up to the killing because of a dispute the two had over cash from the sale of hydraulic car lifts, prosecutors said Friday.

Ronald Franklin, 34, of the 1800 block of West Lake Street, faces charges of murder and arson in the stabbing death of Tyler Bernicky, 25, and the torching of his van June 15 in the 7800 block of South Ingleside Avenue, according to police. Franklin was ordered held without bail Friday, according to court records.

At the time Bernicky was killed, Franklin and Bernicky worked at the same West Side auto shop, which Franklin was trying to buy in part by selling equipment from the shop with the owner's permission, prosecutors said Friday.

A witness told investigators Bernicky had been in the shop when men arrived to buy the car lifts on June 13 and Bernicky took $2,200 from the men for the sale but didn't give it to Franklin, prosecutors said. Franklin became "very upset" when he learned about the sale, calling Bernicky 13 times and sending him six texts, prosecutors said.

Franklin

Bernicky

Investigators tracked down video from June 15 showing Franklin buying lighter fluid, toilet paper and a lighter and then driving to an alley where Bernicky's van was parked and stopping near it, prosecutors said. Phone records also showed him in the area.

About 6 a.m. June 15, Bernicky was found bleeding on the sidewalk, suffering from two stab wounds to the chest, with a trail of blood leading to the burning van, prosecutors said. There was about $1,800 cash in his pockets.

Franklin was arrested just before 7 a.m. Wednesday outside his home, police spokeswoman Sally Bown said in an email.

Bernicky had a 3-year-old son and a baby daughter, according to family members. He was the son of a Chicago Fire Department lieutenant who had planned to open his own car repair business, his stepbrother, David Bernicky II, told the Tribune at the time of the killing.

Northeastern Illinois University students and staff protest as Sean Spicer and Donna Brazile speak in Chicago on Thursday.

Demonstrators gather during Spicer speech

One man 'detained by security' after jumping onto stage

BY MARIE FAZIO

More than 200 students, faculty and staff gathered at Northeastern Illinois University on Thursday night loudly protesting Sean Spicer, who had been invited to the university to speak with Donna Brazile about the 2020 election.

Northeastern Illinois University, which has a majority minority student body, held the event despite an earlier petition to withdraw the invitation to Spicer circulated and amassed over 250 signatures.

The event was mostly peaceful until about 8 p.m., when one man jumped on the stage. The man was "immediately detained by security," said John Escalante, chief of police for the university. Escalante briefly served as interim Chicago police superintendent.

Brett Stockdill, a Northeastern professor of sociology, said the man who jumped on the stage was not involved in the organized protest. It was not immediately clear what charges, if any, the man would face.

Gaby Loredo, a first-generation undocumented student in her third year, rallied the protesters before the event.

"Today I stand before you

undocumented, unafraid and unapologetic," Loredo said to the crowd gathered.

Isaac Krantz-Perlman, a third-year student studying special education, said he found out Spicer was speaking through the Facebook event for the protest.

He attended a Student Government Association meeting this week where students expressed their dissatisfaction with the event.

"Northeastern calls itself a Hispanic-serving institution," Krantz-Perlman said, noting the school had released statements about standing in solidarity with undocumented students.

"He was invited to this campus and can be disinvented to this campus," he said. "If anything, the free speech issue has to deal with our ability to protest."

The group of protesters gathered on the steps outside of Lech Walesa Hall.

After a designated safety marshal from the group expressed a goal of no arrests or suspensions for the event, several students, faculty and others including Chris Poulos, chief of staff for Ald. Rossana Rodriguez Sanchez, spoke to the crowd.

"This is an affront to everyone who goes here. ... Allowing Spicer here sends a clear message that the Muslim ban is OK, that taking away reproductive rights is OK, that tearing families apart at the border is OK," student Raeghn Draper said. "We are here to say that none of that is OK."

Though the protest was relegated to designated zones, the group marched from the front of the LWH building to the atrium of the auditorium, where they continued chants throughout the duration of the event.

Event security allowed them to chant in the building although it was not a designated protest space. As they chanted outside the auditorium, event security confiscated several noise makers from the auditorium, running them outside of the building in cupped hands.

As the group chanted, "Show me what democracy looks like, this is what democracy looks like," Stockdill said the diverse campus body is not reflected in the university's decision to invite Spicer.

Stockdill said he was "horrified" when he received the email announcing the event.

"The university has prioritized Sean Spicer's platform, given it a platform, and it has tried to silence student voices, so it is an issue of free speech because students are not on that stage," Stockdill said.

"The event did what it was supposed to do, which was to provide a venue for vigorous discussion," said Mike Hines, spokesman for the university, noting the talk centered on three issues: politics, the media and the upcoming election.

Hines added the protest was a welcome display of free speech.

Loredo said there are currently four designated free speech spaces on campus but hopes that can be expanded.

Lightfoot calls for new test of water main

Lining in pipes could save trees, taxpayer money

BY JOHN BYRNE

City crews will try out cheaper, less invasive methods to replace aging city water pipes after residents in a few neighborhoods complained about having their trees ripped out for the work, Chicago Mayor Lori Lightfoot announced Friday.

The Water Department will try lining pipes to extend their life rather than tearing them out block by block, technology that's already being used in other cities.

Mayor Rahm Emanuel more than doubled water rates in his early city budgets, justifying the huge cost jump to residents by saying he would use the hundreds of millions of additional dollars per year to undertake the costly process of replacing thousands of miles of aging pipes.

Now the Lightfoot administration plans to look at instead using "cured in place pipe" to replace water mains. The process involves pulling resin-soaked liner

ANTONIO PEREZ/CHICAGO TRIBUNE 2018

The Water Department will be testing a less invasive method that lines existing pipes rather than tearing them out and replacing them.

tubes through the existing pipes and allowing the tubes to harden in place. The pilot also will involve processes to use various liners to fix the private pipes leading from the street to residences.

It's also likely the less invasive technology would require fewer workers and mean smaller paydays for the contractors who are currently jackhammering up streets and cutting down trees all over Chicago as part of the ongoing pipe work.

The locations of the pilots are still being worked out, and the results will come in by the end of 2020, according to the administration.

"If we can find a solution to tree removal while also saving money, I think it's a win for everyone," Ald. Andre Vasquez, 40th, said in a news release announcing the plans. "These pilot programs will allow us to study and analyze our options in the hope of creating a plan that spares trees and hassle for my constituents."

But it remains to be seen whether the pilot programs work. Block Club Chicago first reported that residents in the Andersonville neighborhood were complaining about having their trees ripped out and were pressuring the city to use the lining technology that has been embraced in other cities like Toronto.

$450K settlement over racial slur considered

Man claims cops started fight in downtown garage

BY JOHN BYRNE

The City Council is set to pay $450,000 to a man who was initially charged with stealing a Chicago police sergeant's gun during a fight in a downtown parking garage, only for the charges to be dropped after officers gave conflicting accounts and the man said they used racial slurs and attacked him. The settlement for Joseph Baskins is one of four deals the City Council Finance Committee will consider Monday. Among them is a $9.5 million deal for a man who was badly injured in a bike accident when he hit an old exposed rail car line on a South Side street. In October 2014, Baskins, who is African American, was with friends and family on an elevator in the downtown garage at about 2 p.m.

when three police officers got on. He said they used the N-word to describe the group and an argument ensued. The officers then attacked them, according to Baskins. During the ensuing fistfight, Sgt. Patrick Gilmore pulled a gun on Baskins, according to a federal lawsuit filed by Baskins. Gilmore was badly injured in the fight, suffering brain damage. Baskins fled with Gilmore's gun and was charged with unlawful use of a weapon by a felon. But the charges were dropped in 2017 and Baskins subsequently sued, saying the officers "claimed that Baskins and his group were the aggressors, and initiated criminal action against Baskins as a means of covering up their actions." The $9.5 million settlement the committee will consider would be for Catalin Dumitrescu, who was "permanently disfigured and disabled" in a bicycle accident in 2014 on 56th Street in the Hyde Park neighborhood. Dumitrescu hit an exposed rail car track that was a danger because the city had not properly maintained the street by covering the old track with asphalt, according to the lawsuit in Cook County Circuit Court. Because 56th Street was a bike route at the spot of Dumitrescu's fall, he had reason to believe the city would make the roadway safe for bike riders, according to the suit.

Aldermen are set to approve a $700,000 settlement for the brother of Marlon Horton, who filed a federal lawsuit saying Horton was wrongfully shot in 2013 by a Chicago police officer who was working at the time as a security guard for the Chicago Housing Authority. Also on the agenda is a $300,000 settlement for Jermaine White, who said he was shot without provocation by a Chicago police officer in 2018.

diplomas, birth certificates, death certificates, papers that document migration and movement of families. It's one thing to know your family arrived in Chicago from, say, Mississippi. It's another thing to see the price and times and dates on train tickets, to see photos of relatives, frozen in time, as they embarked on journeys that would forever alter the course of their lives and the structure of America.

One of Snowden Ingram's favorite photos is of her grandparents with their three children — Snowden Ingram's mother and her two siblings — getting ready to board a train from Georgia to Michigan around 1920.

"They had three babies in diapers," Ingram Snowden said. "Cloth diapers! Can you imagine?"

She didn't bring that photo to be digitized. It hangs framed on a wall of her Hyde Park home.

"Bring it in the frame," Williams told her.

"Really?" Ingram Snowden asked.

"Bring it in the frame," Williams answered.

Free digitizing sessions are available at the DuSable Museum through Sept. 20, Evanston Township High School from Sept. 21-28 and Chicago State University from Sept. 24-28. The program has traveled to Baltimore and Denver as well. Next year, staffers will set up temporary shop in New Orleans.

"One gentleman brought in a bag of five photo albums from his grandmother," said Leah Jones, a photographer and digital archivist working at DuSable on Thursday. "People bring in prom photos, wedding photos, family photos. It's important to preserve these images. You want to know what your great-grandmother looked like. You want to know what cousin Ernest from St. Louis, who everyone loved so much, looked like."

Snowden Ingram's photo collection includes her grandmother and grandfather dressed elegantly for a wedding sometime in the '50s. Her mother, the Girl Scout troop leader, surrounded by an 11- or 12-year-old Lauren and her fellow Saginaw, Michigan, Scouts, dressed neatly in their uniforms. (Her family moved from Michigan to Chicago shortly after.)

Young Lauren standing with her mom and cousins in front of a luxury Packard. A portrait of her uncle, Lorenzo Wright, in the Army during World War II. Her mother on her wedding day. A giant group of smiling revelers, toddlers through elders, at a party for her grandfather, who had just retired from the U.S. Rubber Co. in Detroit.

Sometimes the sheer act of collecting the photos and other items becomes a learning experience, Williams said.

"You get a great-aunt and a nephew talking. 'Here's his Pullman porter hat,' 'I didn't know he did that,'" Williams said. "When you have the artifacts, it relaxes you into having these discussions and these conversations. They just flow so much easier."

Earlier this week, Williams said, a woman brought in a single photo. It was of her fourth-great-grandmother, and it was weathered and torn into pieces. Jones, the photographer and archivist on staff, Walter Forsberg, a media conservation technician, holds up a cassette tape of children singing that he is preserving.

was able to digitally stitch the photo back together and provide the woman with a pristine digital version.

As she waited for Jones to work her magic, the woman mentioned that she didn't know her fourth-great-grandmother's name, only that she lived in Texas. Kamilah Stinnett, a genealogy reference assistant on the Community Curation staff, set to work. Within a few minutes of research, she was able to track down the great-great-great-great-grandmother's name.

"It was incredible," Williams said. "Just incredible. She had her baby girl with her, 8 or 9 years old, and the woman told her, 'This is your fifth-great-grandmother!' The girl was jumping up and down. We were all crying."

In the DuSable parking lot, on the north side of the museum, a team of media archivists sits in a truck outfitted with equipment that digitizes cassette tapes and VHS recordings and other audio/visual artifacts.

On Thursday, Walter Forsberg, a media conservation technician, was preserving a cassette tape of children singing with their dad.

"It's pretty charming," Forsberg said. "I don't know why she swallowed a fly" and that sort of thing."

In some cases, Forsberg and his audio/visual digitizing colleagues, Candace Ming and Blake McDowell, are offering families their first glimpse of their family artifacts.

"A lot of the material that's on these old formats is trapped on the formats," Forsberg said, "because people don't have access to the machines they need to watch or hear them."

Family memories captured on Betamax. Graduation speeches and wedding ceremonies sitting on VHS tapes. Ming said someone brought in 8 mm film of the 1965 marches from Selma, Alabama, to Montgomery.

Now they're no longer at risk of being lost to history.

"It really expands the narrative and gives a family's stories the depth they actually had," Williams said. "It brings the stories and history to life."

Huffman

The scandal has embroiled elite universities across the country, including Yale, Stanford, Georgetown and UCLA. It exposed the lengths to which parents will go to get their children into the "right" schools and reinforced suspicions that the college admissions process is slanted toward the rich.

Huffman pleaded guilty in May to a single count of conspiracy and fraud as part of a deal with prosecutors. She must report for her prison sentence in six weeks. She also must pay a $30,000 fine and perform 250 hours of community service.

"I would like to apologize again to my daughter, my husband, my family and the educational community for my actions," Huffman said in an emailed statement after the sentencing hearing. "And I especially want to apologize to the students who work hard every day to get into college, and to their parents who make tremendous sacrifices supporting their children."

In arguing for incarceration, Assistant U.S. Attorney Eric Rosen told the judge that prosecutors had no reason to doubt the rationale Huffman offered — her fears and insecurities as a parent — for taking part in the scheme.

"But with all due respect to the defendant, welcome to parenthood," Rosen said. Huffman's lawyer Martin Murphy argued that her crimes were less serious than those of her co-defendants, noting that she paid a low amount and that, unlike others, she did not enlist her daughter in the scheme.

The case is seen as an indicator of what's in store for other defendants. Over the next two months, nearly a dozen other parents are scheduled to be sentenced. Fifteen parents have pleaded guilty, while 19 are fighting the charges.

Among those contesting the charges are "Full House" actress Lori Loughlin and her fashion designer husband, Mossimo Giannulli, who are accused of paying to get their two daughters into the University of Southern California as fake athletes.

Former Stanford University sailing coach John Vandemoer is the only other person sentenced so far — to a day in prison. He admitted helping students get into Stanford as recruited athletes in exchange for $270,000 for his sailing program.

Huffman paid $15,000 to boost her older daughter's SAT scores with the help of William "Rick" Singer, an admission consultant at the center of the scheme. Singer, who has pleaded guilty, allegedly bribed a test proctor to correct the teenager's answers.

Authorities said Huffman's daughter Sophia got a bump of 400 points from her score on the PSAT, a practice version of the SAT. The actress has said her daughter was unaware of the arrangement.

In a letter this month asking for leniency, Huffman said she turned to the scheme after her daughter's dreams of going to college and pursuing an acting career were jeopardized by her low math score.

"I honestly didn't and don't care about my daughter going to a prestigious college," Huffman wrote. "I just wanted to give her a shot at being considered for a program where her acting talent would be the deciding factor."

Prosecutors countered that Huffman was driven by "a sense of entitlement, or at least moral cluelessness, facilitated by wealth and insularity."

Prosecutors have not said which colleges her daughter applied to with the fraudulent SAT score.

Huffman's husband, actor William H. Macy, was not charged.

The amount Huffman paid is relatively low compared with other bribes alleged in the scheme. Some parents are accused of paying up to $500,000.

Coming for your AR-15? 'Hell, yes'

Lawmakers fear O'Rourke's debate-night throwdown could backfire on Democrats

BY MATTHEW DALY
AND NICHOLAS RICCARDI
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Beto O'Rourke's "hell yes" moment at the Democrats' presidential debate is scrambling his party's message on guns.

The Democrats have long contended their support of gun control laws does not mean they want to take away law-abiding citizens' firearms. But on Friday, they struggled to square that message with their presidential contender's full-throated call on national TV for confiscating assault rifles.

"Hell, yes, we're going to take your AR-15, your AK-47, and we're not going to allow it to be used against your fellow Americans anymore," the former Texas congressman declared during Thursday night's debate.

O'Rourke's hometown of El Paso was the site of a mass shooting last month that killed 22 people, and he's put the issue of gun violence at the center of his campaign effort. On Friday, his campaign hawked T-shirts emblazoned with his debate vow.

However, some fellow Democrats chastised him and fretted that his remarks may have made things harder for gun control supporters as they negotiate with President Donald Trump on legislation to respond to this summer's mass shootings.

"I frankly think that that clip will be played for years at Second Amendment rallies with organizations that try to scare people by saying Democrats are coming for your guns," Sen. Chris Coons of Delaware told CNN Friday. "I don't think a majority of the Senate or the country is going to embrace mandatory buybacks. We need to focus on what we can get done."

His fears about new rages against gun control supporters seem sure to be borne out.

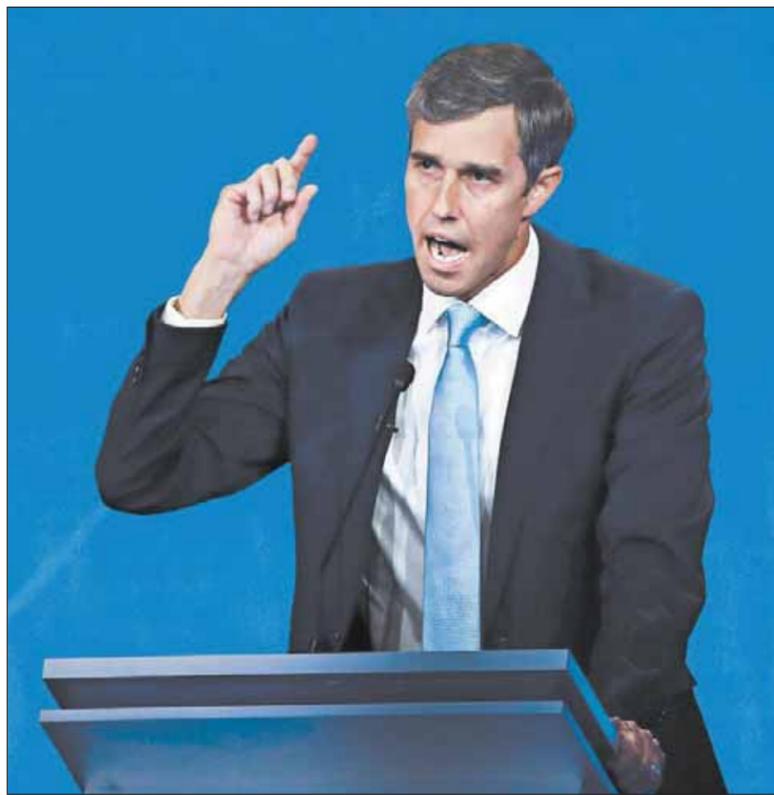

"This is what their goal is. We've always said it, now they're saying it," said Alan Gottlieb of the Second Amendment Foundation, based in Washington state. "Now they've said it and we're going to make them eat it."

Meanwhile, Coons is working with Republican Sen. Pat Toomey of Pennsylvania on a measure to require that law enforcement officials be notified when someone fails a gun-purchase background check. Toomey, who is also working with Democratic Sen. Joe Manchin of West Virginia on the firearms issue, agreed that O'Rourke's comments could backfire.

"This rhetoric undermines and hurts bipartisan efforts to actually make progress on common-sense gun safety efforts, like expanding background checks," he said.

O'Rourke was less provocative in his language but still determined on Friday.

"Much respect to Sen. Coons for leading the fight on background checks," he tweeted. "But the time for letting status quo politics determine how far we can go is over. If we agree that having millions of weapons of war on the streets is a bad idea, we have to do something about it."

One worry among Democrats is that calling for outright confiscation plays into claims by Trump and other Republicans that Democrats are coming for people's firearms.

On Thursday night, just as O'Rourke made his call to take back the rifles, Trump warned at a Republican retreat in Baltimore: "Democrats want to confiscate guns from law-abiding Americans, so they are totally defenseless when somebody walks into their house."

Republicans, Trump promised, "will forever uphold the fundamental right to keep and bear arms." That line got huge applause at the GOP retreat, and again Friday when it was repeated there by Vice President Mike Pence.

By all accounts, Trump needs to run up the score in rural areas to win reelection next year. The 2020 outcome is expected to depend heavily on a trio of Rust Belt states — Michigan, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin — that have large numbers of rural voters, many of whom are gun-owners or sympathetic to owners on this issue. And Democrats' hope of winning control of the Senate rests on states with high rates of gun ownership, like Arizona and Texas.

Several gun control groups stressed on Friday that they were not advocating confiscation, but they also didn't follow Coons' lead in condemning O'Rourke's declaration.

"I think it is very understandable that he is taking a policy position that the larger gun safety community hasn't taken and he's trying to push the envelope," said Robin Lloyd, managing director of Giffords, the gun control group named after Gabby Giffords, the Arizona congresswoman who survived a gunshot wound to the head in 2011. "If the American voter does not think this is an appropriate solution, they'll let us know."

Gun rights groups have seemed to be somewhat on their heels recently as the unabated series of mass shootings has increased pressure for new control measures. Even the staunchly conservative lieutenant governor of Texas, Dan Patrick, said he supports background checks for all gun purchases after the El Paso attack and a second mass shooting in the state. Infighting and investigations at the National Rifle Association and election wins by pro-gun-control Democrats last November have convinced some politicians that the winds have shifted on the gun issue.

Indeed, O'Rourke isn't alone. None of the other nine candidates on the debate stage contradicted him on his proposal to require owners of the two popular styles of assault rifles to sell them to the government. Two candidates — New Jersey Sen. Cory Booker and California Sen. Kamala Harris — have also called for mandatory buybacks of assault weapons. Minnesota Sen. Amy Klobuchar, asked if she agreed with O'Rourke Thursday night, allowed only that she preferred a voluntary buyback to a mandatory one.

All 10 of the Democrats on stage have called for an assault weapon sales ban, the latest sign of how the party has become emboldened on gun control.

Taliban visit Moscow days after Trump says talks 'dead'

MOSCOW — A negotiating team from the Taliban arrived Friday in Russia, a representative told The Associated Press, just days after President Donald Trump declared dead a deal with the insurgent group in Afghanistan.

Russian state news agency Tass cited the Taliban's Qatar-based spokesman Suhail Shaheen as saying the delegation had held consultations with Zamir Kabulov, President Vladimir Putin's envoy for Afghanistan.

The Interfax news agency cited an unidentified Russian Foreign Ministry spokesman as saying the meeting in Russia underlined the necessity of renewing talks between the U.S. and the Taliban, and that the Taliban confirmed their readiness to continuing dialogue with Washington.

It was the Taliban's first international visit following the collapse of talks with Washington.

NY: Family behind OxyContin made $1B in hidden transfers

NEW YORK — The family that owns OxyContin maker Purdue Pharma used Swiss and other hidden accounts to transfer $1 billion to themselves, New York state's attorney general contends in court papers filed Friday.

New York — asking a judge to enforce subpoenas of companies, banks and advisers to Purdue and its owners, the Sackler family — said it has uncovered the previously unknown wire transfers among family members, entities they control and financial institutions.

The transfers bolster allegations by New York and other states that the Sacklers worked to shield their wealth.

According to the filings, transactions sent millions of dollars to Mortimer D.A. Sackler, who then redirected the cash to shell companies that own family homes.

Ohio gamer sentenced to jail for 15 months in 'swatting' case

WICHITA, Kan. — An Ohio gamer upset about a $1.50 bet while playing "Call of Duty: WWII" online was sentenced Friday to 15 months in prison for recruiting a prankster to make a bogus emergency call that resulted in the fatal shooting of a Kansas man by police.

Casey Viner, 19, of North College Hill, Ohio, also is restricted from gaming activity for two years.

Viner pleaded guilty in April to felony charges of conspiracy and obstruction of justice in the hope that he would not be sentenced to prison.

The death of 28-year-old Andrew Finch in Wichita, Kansas, drew national attention to "swatting," a form of retaliation in which someone reports a false emergency to get authorities, particularly a SWAT team, to descend on an address.

Health experts back treatment for kids with peanut allergy

WASHINGTON — Government experts on Friday backed an experimental treatment for children with peanut allergies that could become the first federally approved option for preventing life-threatening reactions.

The treatment is daily capsules of peanut powder that gradually help children build up a tolerance.

The outside panel of advisers to the Food and Drug Administration voted overwhelmingly in favor of the treatment from Aimimmune Therapeutics. The nonbinding vote amounts to an endorsement for approval.

The FDA is expected to make a decision by January.

The panelists said the medication was an important option for parents and children dealing with peanut allergies. However, several also had concerns because the pill has to be taken continuously to maintain its effect.

An estimated 1.6 million children and teenagers in the U.S. would be eligible for the medication, to be sold as Palforzia, which is intended for ages 4 to 17.

After one year, about 66% of study participants who took the pills could tolerate the equivalent of three to four peanuts, compared to just 4% of patients who received a dummy treatment.

At the beginning of the study, most participants could not tolerate even a minuscule amount of peanuts.

But the benefits of the treatment came with risks. More than 9% of patients taking the pills reported severe allergic reactions, more than twice the number in the placebo group. And 11% of patients dropped out of the company's study due to side effects.

Teen mom who buried newborn avoids prison

LEBANON, Ohio — A young Ohio woman acquitted of killing and burying her newborn in the backyard was sentenced Friday to three years' probation on a corpse abuse charge.

Brooke Skylar Richardson, 20, apologized before a Warren County judge told her she showed a "grotesque disregard for life." Richardson buried her newborn daughter in her family's backyard in 2017. Her defense said the baby she called "Annabelle" was stillborn.

"I just wanted to say how sorry I was," Richardson told the judge before he sentenced her. She said she can "sometimes be selfish," and she knows she hurt "so many" people.

Prosecutors argued that she hid her unwanted pregnancy and killed the baby before burying it in her family's backyard so that the high school cheerleader could get on with her "perfect life."

Over 30 Indian worshippers drown during Hindu rituals

NEW DELHI — More than 30 Hindu worshippers have drowned in swollen rivers and in a lake in India as thousands participated in religious ceremonies in which figures of a Hindu god are immersed in water, officials and news reports said Friday.

At least 11 people drowned when their boat capsized early Friday on a lake in central Indian city of Bhopal, rescuers said.

The boat tilted and capsized as the worshippers were immersing a large idol of the Hindu god Ganesh, police said.

The Press Trust of India news agency said 18 other people drowned when they were swept away by flooded rivers in a half dozen towns in western Maharashtra state on Thursday and Friday. Four other worshippers drowned in the Yamuna River in New Delhi during religious ceremonies.

In Spain: Rescue workers saved thousands of people from rising waters Friday as record rainfall pounded southeastern Spain, a deluge that authorities said killed at least four people and closed down airports, trains, roads and schools.

The storm that slammed into the Mediterranean coastal regions of Valencia, Murcia and eastern Andalusia on Thursday and Friday left more than 3,500 people in need of emergency rescues, Interior Minister Fernando Grande-Marlaska said. Some towns and cities reported their heaviest rainfall on record over the past two days, he added.

The downpour forced the closure of airports in Almeria and Murcia as well as intercity train lines, major roads and schools.

Bahamians, fearing the worst, search for loved ones in debris

BY DANICA COTO
Associated Press

MCLEAN'S TOWN, Bahamas — They scan social media, peer under rubble, or try to follow the smell of death in an attempt to find family and friends.

They search amid alarming reports that 1,300 people remain listed as missing nearly two weeks after Hurricane Dorian hit the northern Bahamas.

The government has cautioned that the list is preliminary and many could be staying in shelters and just haven't been able to connect with loved ones.

But fears are growing that many died when the Category 5 storm slammed into the archipelago's northern region with winds in excess of 185 mph and severe flooding that toppled concrete walls, cracked trees in half and ripped swings off playgrounds as Dorian battered the area for a day and a half.

"If they were staying with me, they would've been safe," Phil Thomas Sr. said as he leaned against the frame of his roofless home in the fishing village of McLean's Town and looked into the distance.

The boat captain has not seen his 30-year-old son, his two grandsons or his granddaughter since the storm. They were all staying with his daughter-in-law, who was injured and taken to a hospital in the capital, Nassau, after the U.S. Coast Guard found her — but only her.

"People have been looking, but we don't really come up with anything," Thomas said, adding that he's heard rumors that someone saw a boat belonging to his son, a marine pilot, though the vessel also hasn't been found.

He especially misses his 8-year-old grandson: "He was my fishing partner. We were close."

The loss weighs on Thomas, who said he tries to stay busy cleaning up his home so he doesn't think about them.

"It's one of those things. I'm heartbroken, but life goes on," he said. "You pick up the pieces bit by bit. I've got to rebuild a house. I've got three more kids. I've got to live for them until my time comes."

Meanwhile, a cluster of heavy thunderstorms was heading toward the Bahamas and was expected to further drench the communities bashed by Dorian.

The U.S. National Hurricane Center said the system was expected to become a tropical depression or storm and hit the central and northwestern Bahamas with winds and heavy rains before moving along the east coast of Florida on Saturday.

The approaching storm system was slowing down efforts to bring in aid, and a spokesman for the island's National Emergency Management Agency urged people living in damaged homes in Grand Bahama to move into shelters.

Food and water remain the biggest needs in the hard-hit Abaco islands, where officials temporarily suspended flights as the storm system approaches, NEMA spokesman Carl Smith said.

"Hang in there, we care for you, we will get to you," he said. "It takes time to get to everyone. We are doing our best. We ask people to have patience."

At least 42 people died in Grand Bahama, and Prime Minister Hubert Minnis has warned that number will increase significantly.

"The grief is unbearable," he said in a recent televised address. "Many are in despair, wondering if their loved ones are still alive."

China to suspend punitive tariffs on US soybeans, pork

BY JOE McDONALD
Associated Press

BEIJING — China will lift punitive tariffs imposed on U.S. soybeans and pork in a trade war with Washington, a state news agency said Friday, adding to conciliatory gestures by the two sides ahead of negotiations.

China will suspend tariff hikes on soybeans, pork and some other farm goods, the Xinhua News Agency said, citing the Cabinet planning agency and the Commerce Ministry. Beijing "supports domestic companies in purchasing a certain amount of U.S. farm produce," it said, but it gave no details.

The move follows President Donald Trump's decision Wednesday to delay an Oct. 1 tariff hike on Chinese imports to Oct. 15.

Hopes are growing that the two sides might defuse the prolonged dispute that is threatening global economic growth. But there has been no sign of progress on the main issues in their sprawling conflict over trade and technology.

Beijing's decision to restore access to low-cost U.S. soybeans also would help Chinese pig farmers who use soy as animal feed. They are reeling from an epidemic of African swine fever that has caused pork prices to soar.

"China has a huge market, and the prospects for importing high-quality U.S. farm produce are broad," Xinhua said. "China hopes the United States will be true to its word, make progress on its commitments and create favorable conditions for bilateral agricultural cooperation."

Beijing imposed 25% tariffs on American farm goods last year in response to Trump's tariff hikes on Chinese goods. Importers were ordered to stop buying soybeans, the biggest U.S. export to China. China targeted farm goods, hurting rural areas that supported Trump in the 2016 presidential election.

Secretary Steven Mnuchin called Wednesday's tariff delay by Trump a "goodwill gesture to the Chinese."

The Commerce Ministry said Thursday importers were asking U.S. suppliers for prices of soybeans and pork. It gave no indication whether they planned to place orders.

Washington wants Beijing to roll back plans for state-led development of leaders in robotics and other technologies. The United States, Europe and other trading partners argue those violate China's free-trade commitments.

Some American officials worry they will erode U.S. industrial leadership.

Negotiations broke down in May over how to enforce any deal. Beijing says Trump's tariff hikes must be lifted as soon as an agreement takes effect. Washington wants to keep some in place to ensure Chinese compliance.

Trump and Chinese President Xi Jinping agreed in June to resume talks but the last round in Shanghai in July produced no progress.

Chinese negotiators are due to fly to Washington in early October to meet with Mnuchin and U.S. Trade Representative Robert Lighthizer, according to the treasury secretary. He said mid-level U.S. and Chinese officials were due to meet next week or the following week to prepare.

By delaying his tariff, Trump allowed for the possibility the talks might make enough progress to avert the increase indefinitely. However, economists say a final agreement is unlikely this year.

Face cream bought in Mexico poisons California woman

BY ALEJANDRA REYES-VELARDE
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES — A Sacramento woman has been hospitalized in a semi-comatose state after using face cream purchased from a pharmacy in Jalisco, Mexico, that was tainted with methylmercury, county officials announced this week.

The 47-year-old woman, who was not identified, went to the emergency room with numbness in her hands and face and slurred speech. Her condition worsened over time.

Sacramento County officials would not say more about her condition, citing patient protection laws, but the California Department of Public Health used the woman's experience in a warning about the dangers of buying skin products imported from Mexico.

The woman went from being able to respond to verbal commands to being nonresponsive, according to the Health Department. She began moaning and thrashing and had to be restrained in bed.

In an effort to determine the source of the mercury poisoning, officials tested the woman's cosmetic products, her son told KCRW.

This is the first case of mercury poisoning from a skin cream in the U.S., health officials said.

The woman had 2,630 micrograms of mercury per liter in her blood stream, more than 500 times the normal amount.

Face creams often contain mercury salts, but the woman's toiletry item contained much stronger methylmercury iodide. The cream she was using, which was labeled as a Pond's product, contained 12,000 micrograms of mercury per liter.

Selling products with more than 1 microgram of mercury per liter is illegal in the U.S., according to the California Department of Public Health.

Health officials said mercury-tainted creams are typically sold in California cities through "informal networks" and sometimes are directly imported from Mexico.

In a statement, a representative for Pond's products said company-created creams are safe for use.

"We do not use mercury in our products," said Asia Young, a spokeswoman for Pond's. "We take this matter very seriously and work closely with all authorized retailers to be sure products remain intact and safe for use from shipment to shelf."

UAW extends pact with Chrysler, Ford, Fiat; strike possible at GM

By Tom Krisher
Associated Press

DETROIT — Leaders of the United Auto Workers union have extended contracts with Ford and Fiat Chrysler indefinitely, but the pact with General Motors is still set to expire Saturday night.

The move puts added pressure on bargainers for both sides as they approach the contract deadline and the union starts to make preparations for a strike.

The contract extension was confirmed Friday by UAW spokesman Brian Rothenberg, who declined further comment.

The union has picked GM as the target company, meaning it is the focus of bargaining and would be the first company to face a walkout. GM's contract with the union is scheduled to expire at 11:59 p.m. Saturday.

It's possible that the four-year GM contract also could be extended or a deal could be reached, but it's more likely that 49,200 UAW members could walk out of GM plants as early as Sunday because union and company demands are so far apart.

Picket line schedules already have been posted near the entrance to one local UAW office in Detroit.

Art Wheaton, an auto industry expert at the Worker Institute at Cornell University, expects the GM contract to be extended for a time, but he says the gulf between both sides is wide.

"GM is looking through the windshield ahead, and it looks like nothing but land mines," he said of a possible recession, trade disputes and the expense of developing electric and autonomous vehicles. "I think there's really going to be a big problem down the road in matching the expectations of the union and the willingness of General Motors to be able to give the membership what it wants."

Plant-level union leaders from all over the country will be in Detroit on Sunday to talk about the next steps, and after that, the union likely will make an announcement.

But leaders are likely to face questions about an expanding federal corruption probe that snared a top official on Thursday. Vance Pearson, head of a regional office based near St. Louis, was charged with corruption in an alleged scheme to embezzle union money and spend cash on premium booze, golf clubs, cigars and swanky stays in California. It's the same region that UAW President Gary Jones led before taking the union's top office last year.

The union said the government has misconstrued facts and said the allegations are not proof of wrongdoing.

If there is a strike, it would be the union's first since a short one against GM in 2007.

Nestle to close Glendale Heights distribution facility

By Robert Channick

Nestle is closing a frozen food distribution facility in west suburban Glendale Heights and laying off 121 workers beginning in October.

The facility, which houses products such as Dreyer's ice cream and DiGiorno pizza for direct-to-store delivery, is one of eight company-owned centers being shut down across the U.S. as Nestle shifts to a third-party warehouse distribution model. The transition will take place through next spring, the company said.

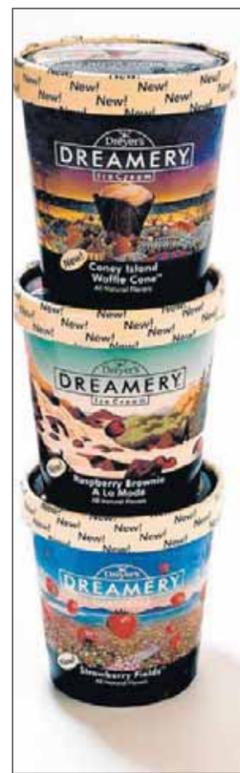

Nestle was among more than a dozen employers warning of nearly 3,600 layoffs in required notices filed with the state last month.

In Chicago, upscale clothier Barneys New York, which filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection and closed its Oak Street store last month, told the state it laid off 128 workers in the process.

Southwest suburban Manteno is taking a one-two punch, with both DHL Supply Chain and XPO Logistics Supply Chain notifying the state of layoffs and facility closures in October. XPO is laying off 755 employees, while DHL is laying off 142, according to the filing.

Nicole Porter, spokeswoman for DHL Supply Chain, said the work in Manteno is "being absorbed" at a new site in Joliet.

"We have been working with Manteno team members to place them in other sites within our Midwest

A Del Monte vegetable canning plant in Mendota is closing and 473 employees will lose their jobs at the end of October. The LaSalle County facility packages peas, corn, mixed vegetables and carrots. The move is part of a strategy by California-based Del Monte to shed assets and cut costs.

MetroSouth Medical Center in Blue Island told the state it will lay off 814 workers when it shutteres the south suburban hospital in October. Several legislators have petitioned the state to delay the closing.

Other employers notifying the state of mass layoffs include Chicago options exchange CBOE and a Flex manufacturing facility in Buffalo Grove.

The Illinois Worker Adjustment and Retraining Notification Act requires businesses with 75 or more employees to provide the state with 60 days advance notice of pending plant closures or mass layoffs.

VOICE OF THE PEOPLE

Tipped workers struggle to pay bills

As a single mother struggling to put food on the table while paying my rent, I know how hard it is to survive in this city. Every day, I wonder if the next knock on the door will be the sheriff coming to evict my family and me.

I hear a lot of talk about the minimum wage, but many people don't realize that the regular minimum wage does not apply to tipped workers like me. That's why I support the "Raise Chicago" ordinance, which would eliminate the subminimum tipped wage.

The minimum wage for tipped workers in Chicago is just $6.40 an hour. The rest of my wages are supposed to come from tips, but many times those tips fall short.

If my total pay is below the minimum wage, the employer is supposed to cover the difference, but that doesn't always happen. Imagine trying to live on just $6.40 an hour.

Not only does the tipped minimum wage make it hard to survive, but also it is discriminatory. Tipping itself only started after the Civil War, with employers trying to find a way to underpay formerly enslaved people. These days, many studies show that tipping discriminates against women and people of color, making it especially hard for black women like me to get ahead.

Because wages for tipped workers are so low, I have to work multiple jobs, making it harder to spend time with my loved ones. And even though I work, I still rely on food stamps and Medicaid to take care of my family — and that is still not enough to buy food and clothes for us. I want a decent quality of life, but with the tipped minimum wage so low, I feel trapped.

Right now, the Chicago City Council is considering the "Raise Chicago" ordinance, which would gradually eliminate the tipped minimum wage, bringing workers like me up to the minimum wage paid to the rest of Chicago. This ordinance would help me and many others like me afford the basics — food, rent and health care — needed to live in Chicago.

— Honni Harris, Chicago

Anesthesia care is expertly handled

The patient care team is alive and well in hospitals across Illinois — and will remain so — despite what physician anesthesiologists like letter writer Dr. Wendy B. Binstock ("The fate of team-based anesthesia," Sept. 11) asserts.

Contrary to Binstock's statements about supposed legislation to remove physician supervision of certified registered nurse anesthetists, or CRNAs, the Illinois Nurse Practice Act already does not require these highly qualified anesthesia experts to be supervised by physicians.

Patients can rest assured that the quality of their care is secure, and here's why. If you are going to have surgery, you will be under the watchful care of a team of health care professionals including, but not limited to, the surgeon, an anesthesia professional (either a CRNA or an anesthesiologist, sometimes both), an operating room nurse, a circulating nurse and other providers.

Each team member collaborates with the others with one goal in mind: to make sure you receive the safest care and have the best possible outcome.

When a CRNA is the only anesthesia professional working a case, the surgeon relies on the CRNA's expertise so he or she can concentrate on performing the surgery at hand.

Bottom line: The patient care team is a fundamental concept embraced by CRNAs and the many other health care professionals who work together to enhance and preserve the well-being of citizens in Illinois.

It is a concept that is here to stay.

Pension crisis affects everyone

I attended the City Club of Chicago's Sept. 9 panel on pensions, moderated by Tribune Editorial Board member Kristen McQueary. The room was filled with a wide variety of professionals, from government agencies and banking institutions to nonprofits and think tanks, and it appeared everyone agreed Illinois' pension crisis needs a solution now.

What also appears clear to me is that most people in Illinois tune out any discussion of the pension issue because they don't think it affects them.

The pension issue doesn't just affect those who have state-funded retirement plans. Unfortunately, not enough people realize just how directly this crisis affects their everyday lives.

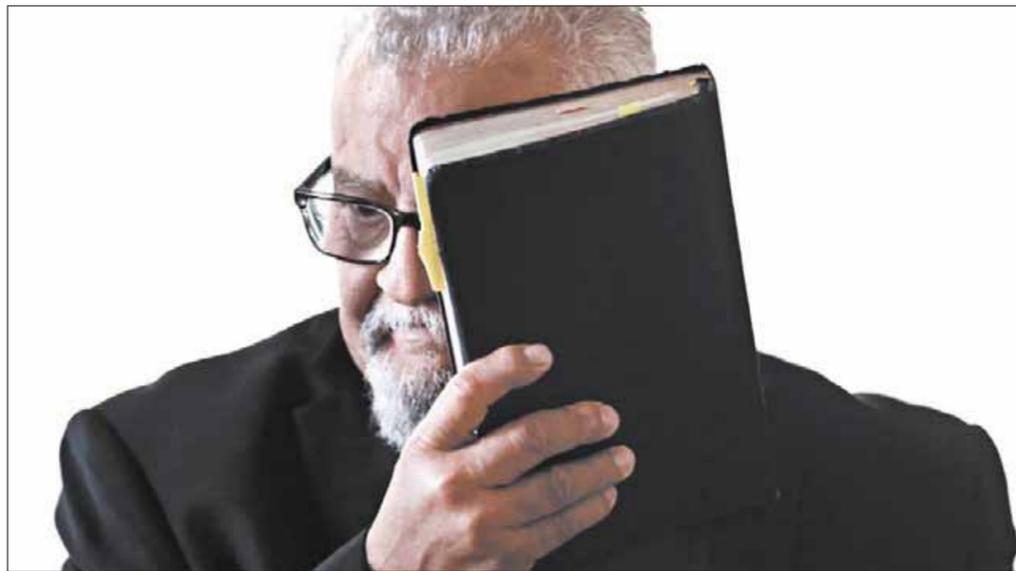

Pension spending in Illinois has increased close to 500% in the last two decades. That means we're seeing a massive shortfall in state spending on social services like child welfare and police protection. If that's not concerning enough, the spike in pension payments also directly affects our property taxes, which are the second-highest in the nation.

The spiral continues: With increasing property taxes, we see population loss. Illinois has lost substantial population for five years running. Every taxpaying resident should be concerned about this shrinking tax base carrying more and more of the burden.

It's a statewide problem, and we can't let politicians continue to ignore commonsense reforms for the future of all state workers, retirees and taxpayers. To do so is to place the burden squarely on our children, who will inherit a bankrupt state government that demands more of their earnings but won't be able to provide adequate state benefits.

As Kristen, and most of the panelists, asked: What's the harm in letting the people vote on a constitutional amendment to the pension clause of the Illinois Constitution?

TERRENCE ANTONIO JAMES/CHICAGO TRIBUNE 2018

A team of lawyers billed the city $5.8 million for defending former Detective Reynaldo Guevara and others.

Why did city pay lawyers $213M to defend police misconduct cases?

One significant change Mayor Lori Lightfoot has made at City Hall is creating an Office of Risk Management and putting an administration official, Tamika Puckett, in charge. Among Ms. Puckett's tasks: trying to prevent Chicago from spending almost another billion dollars on police misconduct litigation.

Nearly a billion dollars? Yep, that's the outrageous tally. Over the last 15 years, police litigation has cost Chicago $970 million. Wrapped into that amount is $757 million paid out in settlements, losses at trial and other costs related to police cases. Then there is $213 million spent by City Hall on private lawyers dealing with those allegations, the Tribune's Dan Hinkel reports.

It's City Hall's job to protect the interests of taxpayers when Chicago is hit with lawsuits. But far too many times, the city finds itself mounting defenses for police officers accused of behaving badly. The cases can last years, as the legal bills pile up.

Remember disgraced Chicago police Cmdr. Jon Burge? Between 2004 and early 2019, the city paid more than $27 million for outside lawyers to defend the city in lawsuits against Burge and his associates. Then there was former Detective Reynaldo Guevara. A team of lawyers billed the city $5.8 million in legal fees and expenses for defending Guevara and others from allegations related to one incident.

When Lightfoot created the city's first Office of Risk Management, her team said one focus would be "lawsuits concerning police practices which cost the city tens of millions of dollars a year."

The mayor is desperate to close an $838 million 2020 budget gap. To attack that deficit, there are a few ways for Lightfoot, Puckett and others to strive to reduce the heavy cost of police misconduct. One, of course, is to improve policing so there are fewer allegations. Under a federal consent decree, the Chicago Police Department must overhaul officer training, supervision and oversight — reforms designed to improve officer performance over time. The faster that happens, the better.

Another is being more cost-effective with legal expenditures. Chicago relies heavily on hiring private attorneys, who earn up to $295 per hour, to handle police cases.

Do other major cities farm out litigation work at a similar pace to Chicago's? Or do they rely more on in-house lawyers, who don't charge by the hour? Do outside lawyers provide better — or merely comparable — results? Should some or many of these cases be settled more quickly?

Chicago's new top lawyer, Mark Flessner, told the Tribune that Chicago's practice of spending on outside counsel is "scandalous." Maybe so. But that's hard for us to evaluate until City Hall gives Chicagoans the answers to those four questions.

Sounds like everyone in City Hall is on the same page. So Mayor Lightfoot, let's see what your team can do to bring down the high cost of police misconduct in Chicago.

Spicer spoke at Northeastern Illinois. Some students protested. Perfect.

Former White House press secretary Sean Spicer appeared Thursday night at a Northeastern Illinois University event, and some people disapproved. More than 200 students and faculty and staff members protested. "This is an affront to everyone who goes here," student Raeghn Draper said.

In other words, the event was a shining success. NEIU exemplified how a university should embrace free expression — speech and counter-speech — rather than cancel a forum because some members of the community dislike the speaker or topic.

Spicer, who worked for President Donald Trump, appeared with Donna Brazile, former head of the Democratic National Committee, to discuss the 2020 election. No university funds were involved, but some members of the NEIU community saw Spicer's appearance as an endorsement of Trump.

College campuses tend to lean liberal. But no ideology should breed the intolerance evident when students and professors clamor to be protected from people and ideas they consider anathema. So some speakers, typically conservatives, are disinvited from events or angrily shouted down. Many speakers are never invited in the first place.

Yet colleges are places of learning where ideas should be explored and judged on the merits. Turning a campus into an intellectually comfy cocoon disserves students, who lose the chance to shop for themselves in the marketplace of ideas. Protecting students also teaches a useless lesson about the value of safe spaces: Once out of college, people rarely get to declare their lives controversy-free zones. Everyone has to deal with other people, even the ones they find disagreeable.

NEIU stood its ground. Administrators didn't cave to anger. Spicer did appear, with apparently minimal interruption from one person who jumped on the stage. Those who didn't want Spicer on campus had their say: The university provided designated areas for protesters. Speech was met with speech.

All who participated should feel good about that.

Now, who's next to be invited to campus?

IN PERFORMANCE 'Five Presidents' ★★★

Civilized conversation

Ford, Carter, Reagan, Bush and Clinton in the same tiny room at American Blues

BY CHRIS JONES

It's funny. As politically divided as Americans have become, most of us still want to believe that our political leaders are capable of a civilized conversation. It's a reminder, I suppose, of the fundamental parent-child relationship in political leadership. When seeming enemies talk warmly to each other, it calms our fears of splinter, division and dissolution.

That's one point of view, anyway. And it's the premise of Rick Cleveland's "Five Presidents," a funny and warm-spirited little piece of fictionalized history at American Blues Theater, all about the gathering for the funeral of one of the chilliest figures in presidential history — Richard Milhous Nixon. At that sendoff in 1994 at the Nixon Library in Yorba Linda, Calif., member Nos. 38 through 42 in the world's most prestigious club were all in the same place. Cleveland takes that historical fact and then imagines them stuck in the same holding room, right before the beginning of all the eulogies.

And thus, over 80 entertaining minutes, we watch the former presidents Gerald R. Ford (Tom McElroy), Jimmy Carter (Martin L'Herauld), Ronald Reagan (James Leaming) and George H.W. Bush (John Carter Brown) all cooling their heels together, alongside the chatty kid who just took office, Bill Clinton (Stephen Spencer). I am no intimate of presidents, but my sense of these rare gatherings is that these men (and they are all men) tend to avoid going over their past disagreements, their mistakes in office, their grudges and their scandals. And in reality, a funeral tends to mean the spouse is along. But this would not be a fun play if Cleveland imagined everyone making small talk with Nancy Reagan about the California weather. So you have to swallow the idea that these men would all be alone together for more than an hour, engaging in frank repartee, riffing and kickboxing, settling a few scores and also looking for elements of shared experience.

And that's pretty much what you get as "Five Presidents" unfolds in real time in a room dominated by Nixon's intimidating portrait, scaring his successors half to death.

Cleveland, a fine Chicago playwright ("Tom and Jerry") who went on to write most of the greatest "Six Feet Under" episodes and a healthy chunk of "The West Wing," is an important American writer who specializes in the inner lives of presidents and apparatchiks (he's especially interested in Clinton, the subject of Cleveland's droll fantasia, "My Buddy Bill"). I wouldn't say "Five Presidents" is one of Cleveland's major works, although he has done some work on the script since I first saw this piece in Milwaukee in 2015. Clinton is notable less sympathetic, perhaps reflecting the change in the wind. The role of Agent Kirby (Denzel Tsopnang) has been beefed up so that he offers more commentary on the lack of diversity in the room, albeit speaking with a frankness that it hard to imagine a Secret Service agent being willing to do. And, in general, the work has been tightened and freshened.

The most interesting performance within a generally straightforward production from director Marty Higginbotham is from Leaming, whose depiction of Reagan, generally played as a stereotype in the American theater, is very moving. Cleveland writes Reagan as being in the early stages of his dementia, much to the chagrin of Bush, who is trying to prevent any kind of public embarrassment that might come from a Reagan eulogy. Both Leaming and Brown handle that very beautifully, but then all of these performances are well-crafted. It's far harder to play, say, Carter, than a fictional character, for you have to navigate to that sweet spot between impression and interpretation. The physical resemblances vary, although L'Herauld is as close as a peanut to a shell. But, impressively, all five of the presidential-level actors manage to be close enough for their quarry to be recognizable and yet distant enough for the piece to come alive as an imaginative act.

If you like "The West Wing" or enjoy reliving the machinations of the Oval Office from the end of the last century, you'll have a good time. In the end, of course, the play cannot help but make the point that all presidents have strengths and weaknesses, all come and go in popularity, and all get replaced.

IN PERFORMANCE

'Considering Matthew Shepard' encore just as enlightening, hopeful

BY HOWARD REICH

More than two decades after Matthew Shepard was murdered, his story still resonates.

For to revisit the plight of a 21-year-old gay student attacked in his native Wyoming, then abandoned, is to realize anew the consequences of hate.

Yet as with many such tragedies — including slavery, the Holocaust and too many other genocides — unspeakable acts have inspired profound works of art. One of them, "Considering Matthew Shepard," received an encore performance Thursday night at the Ravinia Festival, after its successful Chicago-area premiere there last summer. Even on a second viewing, the oratorio proved so gripping and enlightening that I wish it would be performed every year, so more of us could absorb its lessons of hope and transcendence.

"Considering Matthew Shepard," composed by Craig Hella Johnson for his Texas-based choir Conspirare, is no grim retelling of what happened. Yes, it reminds us that after Aaron Mc-Kinney and Russell Henderson met Shepard on the night of Oct. 6, 1998, they "drove him to a remote area, tied him to a buck and rail fence, beat him horribly and left him to die in the cold of night," to quote the work's script. Shepard died on Oct. 12; McKinney and Henderson were convicted of murder.

But that's only a small part of "Considering Matthew Shepard," which begins and ends with the same word: "All." After its first utterance, we hear a lone male voice yodeling: an evocation of the wide-open West that Shepard loved. From there, the piece segues into disarming cowboy songs and sweet hymnody, but also into searing blues and incendiary chant contemplating the horror of what happened.

As the Conspirare singers and a small contingent of instrumentalists tell the tale (with composer Johnson leading from the keyboard), we see images projected onto screens in Ravinia's pavilion: snippets of Shepard's journals; photos of the killers; and news footage of protesters at Shepard's funeral carrying signs reading

"Get Back in Your Damn Closet" and others even more vile.

Soon, however, the oratorio reaches a turning point, the sting of hate and pain giving way to chords of serenity and peace. The choir that once thundered now soothes, the music becoming ever more simple, direct, pure. We hear prayers sung in multiple languages; we see projected images of stars in the night sky.

As the work nears its end, the choristers sing of "Love that lifts us up. All Of Us. All"

That composer Johnson has managed to draw this message from such a heinous act stands as a testament not only to his vision but to his craft as composer. It would have been very easy for this work to have devolved into treacle or pastiche — or both. Instead, Johnson has penned a straightforward, sublimely melodic, utterly unpretentious score, its music as all-embracing as its text.

The triumphant moment comes at the end, when vocalists stand up from amid the audience — to listeners' surprise — and sing in harmony with Conspirare onstage. At this instant, a performance piece has become a communal experience, the sound and warmth of "Considering Matthew Shepard" enveloping everyone.

PATRICK GIPSON

Because Conspirare presented the piece last year at Ravinia's Martin Theatre, I'd wondered if the experience would lose its intimacy in the larger pavilion. Surprisingly, the connection between performers and listeners felt every bit as close, the audience barely stirring during the performance. And the much larger size of the pavilion gave "Considering Matthew Shepard" added dramatic impact, particularly when the "All of Us" Chorus — featuring more than 500 high school students and others from across the Chicago area — rose up from the audience to sing.

It was a galvanic moment that will be long remembered. And it persuaded me that "Considering Matthew Shepard" will endure for as long as we are willing to confront hate with one of our most powerful antidotes: great art.

ASK AMY

Grandfather has new wife, new will

Dear Amy: My grandfather is well-off. He saved and spent very little throughout his life. For many years, he has promised my mother and me that we would receive a sizable inheritance. My grandmother died several years ago, and we are the only close family members left.

A few months ago, my grandfather began seeing a younger woman. My mom and I were supportive. They married just a few weeks ago and seem very happy together. However, my grandfather recently called Mom and me and informed us that we are no longer his heirs. He's decided to leave everything to his new wife!

Amy, I don't feel entitled to his money. I don't care if I get the money. I am more worried about my mother. She lives on a meager income, and I know she was counting on the inheritance so she could think about retiring. Now she is depressed and thinks she will have to work herself to death.

I'm not in a much better situation, and I do not have the means to help Mom on my own. Meanwhile, my grandfather and his new wife are constantly sending us pictures of their luxurious vacations. They also recently bought themselves a second home.

To be clear, I do not believe my grandfather's new wife is a gold digger. She seems to genuinely love him and, being a member of a well-off family herself, she doesn't need his money. This seems to be purely my grandfather's decision.

Would it be out of line to approach my grandfather to ask him to consider reinstating Mom as an heir? I don't care what he does with me, but this has really upset her.

— Concerned Daughter

Dear Concerned: Your grandfather might have made this decision as a way to show his wife just after marriage how much he loves her and that he is proud to declare her as his next of kin. (They also might have a prenup.) His motivation might have been more emotional than practical or punitive.

I do think you should speak to him about it. Be sure to reflect your positive reaction to his marriage: "I'm so happy that you have found such a wonderful partner. Shelly is a nice addition to our family. I understand that you love each other and are committed to each other. I also accept that you have the right to do whatever you wish with your will. I'm glad you told Mom and me about your intentions. However, I feel the need to advocate for Mom ..."

Describe her situation honestly. Repeat that you understand and respect his right to do what he wants to do, but ask him to also consider these other factors in his estate planning.

Dear Amy: I am an older woman, an introvert, who has kept diaries, journals and notes my whole life. And naturally, in them I "let my hair down." Now it is time for me to destroy them; I wouldn't want them found after I'm gone.

Unfortunately, they are in plastic-bound, hard cardboard or spiral books. I have no idea how to dispose of them, and there are a ton of them. The thought of having to extricate the paper from the covers is overwhelming.

One thing I could do is take a few at a time and wrap them in black plastic and put them in the garbage and hope no one finds them. Do you have a better suggestion?

— Overwhelmed

Dear Overwhelmed: If you are absolutely sure you want to do this, you should think about shredding. If you don't want to purchase a shredder and separate the paper from the bindings to do this at home, there are professional shredding companies that will send a truck to your location and do this onsite as you watch.

Some companies I researched advertise that they will shred books.

Dear Amy: The letter from the (divorced) "Sad Mom" told my story. Her youngest son wouldn't call on her birthday or Mother's Day.

This line jumped out at me: "He is actually showing how he feels about himself." That is so true! Her son could be grieving the divorce. I too did not receive any sign from my son on birthdays, Mother's Day, Christmas, etc.

I never pushed him, because grieving takes time. It took my son three years!

— Patient

Dear Patient: Patience often works better than pushing.

DANIEL JOHNSTON 1961-2019

Underground Texas music legend dies at 58

By PETER BLACKSTOCK
Austin American-Statesman

AUSTIN, Texas — Daniel Johnston, who passed out cassette tapes of his songs to fellow Austin musicians in the 1980s and eventually became renowned worldwide as a songwriter, died early Wednesday morning in Houston, his manager Tom Gimbel confirmed Wednesday afternoon.

Johnston had been in the hospital with kidney issues but was released Tuesday night to the assisted living facility where he had been living recently. He was found unconscious there Wednesday morning, Gimbel said.

A news release issued Wednesday afternoon attributed his death to "natural causes." Gimbel noted that Johnston's health "had been touch-and-go for a while" with complications from diabetes and other issues.

Dick Johnston, Daniel's older brother, said in a statement: "I always wanted Danny to feel like his own person and in control of his own life. Since beginning to work and travel with him in about 2003, we gratefully were able to travel the entire globe for over a decade to get out before the fans. He was always, everywhere, warmly received and he at least knew he was well loved. Health issues have plagued us for years; I'm glad for the time we had.

Musicians such as Kurt Cobain and Tom Waits, as well as "The Simpsons" creator Matt Groening, are among those who have expressed a fondness for Johnston's work.

Johnston's struggles with manic depression formed the heart of the Oscar-nominated 2005 documentary "The Devil and Daniel Johnston." His songs often contained innocent pleas for love and bore titles such as

"Life in Vain," "True Love Will Find You in the End" and "Walking the Cow."

Johnston also made his mark on Austin with the iconic "Hi, How Are You" mural at 21st and Guadalupe streets. He created it in 1993 on the exterior wall of what was then the Sound Exchange record store. The frog-like character in the mural is known as "Jeremiah the Innocent."

For years in the 1980s and '90s, thanks to a timely clip on MTV, Johnston symbolized underground rock in Austin. His charming songs, no-fi recording style and devotion to distributing his unique music on cassettes made him an iconic figure on the American margins.

"I just feel really privileged to have had the chance to work with him," said Gimbel, speaking from Nashville, Tenn., where he'd just arrived for Wednesday evening's Americana Music Awards.

"I think he's one of the greatest geniuses of our time."

'Hollywood Ripper' to be featured on '48 Hours'

By JESSICA VILLAGOMEZ

The case of convicted serial killer and Glenview native Michael Gargiulo will be broadcast on a special two-hour "48 Hours" investigation scheduled to air on CBS TV this Saturday at 8 p.m.

Gargiulo, who is most commonly known as "The Hollywood Ripper," was found guilty in 2019 of the murder of Ashley Ellerin, 22, who was killed in her Hollywood, Calif., home in 2001. Gargiulo was also convicted of the 2005 murder of Maria Bruno, 32, in El Monte, Calif., and the 2008 attempted murder of Michelle Murphy in Santa Monica, Calif.

But before he moved to California, officials said Gargiulo's first murder was in his hometown. One of his alleged victims was Tricia Pacaccio, an 18-year-old Glenbrook South High School graduate who was stabbed in the chest in the early hours of Aug. 14, 1993, in her family's home in Glenview, officials said. Her father found her body hours later.

Gargiulo was charged in 2011 in Illinois for her murder but has yet to face trial in the state. The trial in California has yet to move to a penalty phase, but prosecutors will recommend either a death sentence or life in prison without parole.

Prosecutors in Illinois will have to wait until Gargiulo's trial in California is completed before moving Pacaccio's case forward.

In the two-hour special, Chicago-based "48 Hours" investigates the case that brought Gargiulo to trial in California. The episode features interviews with former friends and the Pacaccio family.

Maier also has a conversation with Gargiulo in jail.

'THE GOLDFINCH' ★★

Floundering adaptation doesn't sing like the novel

By KATIE WALSH
Tribune News Service

Donna Tartt's Pulitzer Prize-winning tome "The Goldfinch" was a blockbuster best-seller and the toast of book clubs in 2013. The film adaptation should have been slam dunk, with director John Crowley, fresh off the acclaimed "Brooklyn," legendary cinematographer Roger Deakins, and screenwriter Peter Straughan adapting Tartt's novel. And yet, the movie is simmering and dull, devoid of tension, an overwrought and uninvolved film that is both a personal drama and a crime mystery, but also neither of those things, and nearly, nothing at all.

The non-linear and twisty script is wrapped up with coincidence and reveals, though there is precious little in the way of emotional connection or character building. Absolutely none of the assumptions that we, as the audience, are supposed to make about our main character are earned. Straughan's script is endless rug-pulling simply for the sake of it, which is ultimately irritating and distancing from the characters, whom we are able to appraise with only mild interest. They're fine to spend two-and-a-half hours with, but not particularly interesting company either.

It's the story of the tragic life of Theo Decker, played by Oakes Fegley and Ansel Elgort. When he's 13 (Fegley), Theo survives a bombing at The Met that kills his mother. This is the event to which we return again and again, searching for answers, as Theo blames himself. It's also the source of his dark secret. In the aftermath of the bombing, he has come into possession of a famous Dutch painting, The Goldfinch by Carel Fabritius. Theo stashes it away, hiding it from his ad hoc foster family and from his degenerate addict father (Luke Wilson), who whisks him away from New York City to a Las Vegas suburb on the edge of the desert.

Crowley and Deakins create a warm and richly rendered world. New York is crisp and cozy, filled with tweed coats, glowing wood, candlelight and fine art. But the story there is frustratingly coy, the scenes flabby with excess time, air and heft. There's a good movie in the middle of "The Goldfinch," in Vegas, where the danger feels real, and Fegley gets to dig in and show his chops. Finn Wolfhard shows up as teenage Ukrainian delinquent Boris, and no one shoots the desert like Deakins. Compared to the darkness on display in this part of the film, and the edginess that Fegley gets to demonstrate while Theo learns the rough stuff about life from his father and father's girlfriend, Xandra (Sarah Paulson), Elgort's stuffy and utterly soft portrayal of grown Theo, pulling mild antique scams back in New York, is a snooze.

"The Goldfinch" is both too long and too short; dull to watch but scanty on the details about logistics, character, and just how anything of note actually occurs. The mystery of the film is something to be endured, rather than solved.

"Pete's Dragon" (10:30 p.m., FREE): For this 2016 live-action re-imagining of a 1977 Walt Disney musical fantasy, director David Lowery cast young Oakes Fegley as Pete Healy, an orphan living by his wits in the wilds of the Pacific Northwest with only a (sometimes invisible) dragon named Elliot (voiced by John Kassir) as a companion. Bryce Dallas Howard stars as a forest ranger who befriends Pete.

"College Football" (6:30 p.m., ABC): The Clemson Tigers' perfect 2018 season almost didn't happen, as they were nearly upset by the Syracuse Orange — the team they visit today. Syracuse is coming off a 10-3 season and a bowl-game victory over West Virginia, and is poised to give the reigning college football champions everything they have in the Carrier Dome. They'll have to stop Clemson running back Travis Etienne, who spoiled the upset bid.

"Welcome to Marwen" (7 p.m., 2:40 a.m., HBO): Oscar-winning director Robert Zemeckis brought his trademark visual wizardry to this decidedly odd 2018 drama which, nevertheless, is based on a true story. Steve Carell stars as Mark Hogancamp, who creates a model village (named Marwen) peopled by fashion dolls as a means of coping with acute memory loss and devastating post-traumatic stress disorder after he suffers a brutal assault by a gang of white supremacists.

"A Dog's Way Home" (7 p.m., 3:31 a.m., Starz): Actor-director Charles Martin Smith ("Never Cry Wolf") helmed this heartwarming 2019 adaptation of a novel by W. Bruce Cameron, who co-wrote the screenplay. The family-friendly yarn follows the adventures of Bella, a pup who travels more than 400 miles from New Mexico to Denver to find her owner (Jonah Hauer-King) after they're separated. Bella's voice is provided by Bryce Dallas Howard.

"Forever in My Heart" (8 p.m., Hallmark): Having recently become engaged, Jenna Murphy (Merritt Patterson) is on a business trip when she decides to visit a family-run inn in Ireland where she worked a few years earlier. The cozy operation in the beautiful Irish countryside starts to feel like home to her once again, and she's unprepared for how strongly drawn she is to her old flame there, Charlie O'Hanlon (Jack Turner). She feels torn between two possible futures for herself.

"Love & Marriage: Huntsville" (8 p.m., 11 p.m., OWN): In a new episode called "Martell It Like It Is," Martell decides to move upstairs as part of a desperate bid to save his marriage, while Melody does her best to keep up appearances at a photo shoot. Elsewhere, Maurice is focused almost entirely on moving his son to Huntsville, and Marsau takes Latisha into his confidence concerning the rumor Martell is spreading ... namely, that Marsau has no fewer than 20 girlfriends.

Pop-rock singer known for 'Two Tickets to Paradise'

BY HARRISON SMITH
The Washington Post

Eddie Money, a onetime police officer trainee who sang his way to pop-rock stardom in the late 1970s with songs such as "Two Tickets to Paradise" and "Baby Hold On," died Friday in Los Angeles. He was 70.

His family announced the death, according to The Associated Press. Money underwent heart valve surgery in the spring, canceled concert dates because of pneumonia and revealed in August that he had Stage 4 esophageal cancer.

A singer-songwriter who also played the saxophone, keyboards and harmonica, he specialized in blue-collar rock — notably in "Take Me Home Tonight" (1986), which featured former Ronettes vocalist Ronnie Spector.

The single revitalized Spector's singing career, earned a Grammy nomination and became Money's biggest commercial success, reaching No. 4 on the Billboard charts.

Its popularity capped a remarkable decade-long run for Money, a Long Island rocker who was plucked from obscurity by rock impresario Bill Graham; opened for Santana, the Rolling Stones and the Who; nearly crippled himself from a drug overdose; and recovered in the early 1980s to become a shaggy-haired fixture of the newly created television channel MTV.

"Ever since I was young I'd sing in my home/ Those crazy songs I heard on the radio," he declared in "Wanna Be a Rock 'n' Roll Star," from his 1977 self-titled debut. He wanted "a mansion on the hill" and "thousand dollar bills" to burn, he said, and to some degree he got it — certified platinum records, if not wheelbarrows of cash, and a devoted following that persisted into recent years, when he continued touring and starred with his family in an AXS reality series called "Real Money."

Labeled "rock's Rodney Dangerfield" by Rolling Stone, Money had initially pursued a far more conventional lifestyle, following his father and grandfather into the New York Police Department. He worked for two years as a clerk and typist, but in 1968 he either quit or was fired — he told both versions of the story, invariably citing his desire to grow out his hair — and moved to Berkeley, California.

He supported himself by selling bell-bottom blue jeans and, perennially broke, adopted a tongue-in-cheek stage name, dropping a few letters from his surname, Mahoney, to become Eddie Money.

Money said he linked up with Graham after playing in a battle of the bands contest at the promoter's Winterland Ballroom venue in San Francisco. With Graham's help, he signed a contract with Columbia Records, resulting in a studio debut that spawned two Top 40 singles, "Baby Hold On" and "Two Tickets to Paradise."

Money found mixed success with a pair of follow-up records and had finished a tour for "Playing for Keeps" (1980) when he snorted a barbiturate, phenobarbital, apparently believing it was cocaine. Amid a night of heavy drinking, he "went into a semi-catatonic state," he said, damaging his kidneys and the sciatic nerve in his left leg.

He was unable to walk for nearly a year.

Into the early 1990s, Money had hits such as "I Wanna Go Back," "Peace in Our Time" (originally released by Jennifer Holliday), "I'll Get By," "Endless Nights" and "Walk on Water," which peaked at No. 9 on the charts.

Edward Joseph Mahoney was born in Brooklyn on March 21, 1949, and raised in Levittown, New York. He married Laurie Harris in 1989 and had five children. Several performed with him in recent years. A complete list of survivors was not immediately available.

Today's deal features an interesting defensive problem and highlights an important defensive principle. Declarer has no control over his result — it's all up to the defense.

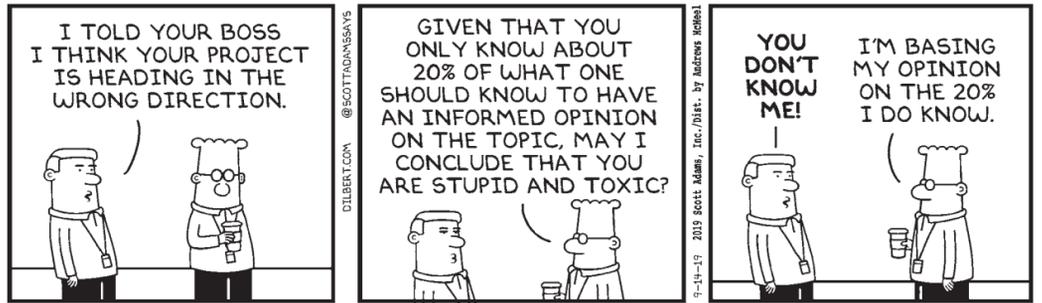

East plays the two of clubs at trick one, discouraging. West continues with the queen of clubs and East shows his "present count" in the suit by playing his nine. West now knows that another club trick is cashing, so he leads the king of clubs. What now? The winning continuation is a fourth round of clubs, giving declarer a ruff-sluff but promoting East's jack of spades into the setting trick. West will probably find this play, but it isn't certain.

Can East help West find the winning play? East could play his second and third clubs in reverse order, playing the three followed by the nine. This "red flag" should cause partner to sit up and take notice. "Why did my partner play his clubs that way? He must be calling my attention to something unusual". Yes, this might work. It is also possible that partner will see the three of clubs at trick two and decide that the third club isn't cashing. He might shift at trick three.

"Don't tell partner what to do. Tell him what you have and let him figure out what to do" is an important defensive principle. "Red flags" should be rare. East should just play his cards normally and let West figure it out.

Maddon: 'I can't lament anything'

Joe Maddon is willing to let his record stand on its own. No matter what happens to him after this season, the Cubs manager is confident he has done everything he can to help the team win. "I feel so good about the body of work we've done here I can't lament anything," Maddon said Friday before the Cubs pounded the Pirates 17-8 in the opener of the final homestand of the season at Wrigley Field. "There's nothing for me to worry about, be upset about, (be) anything about. We've done pretty well." The end-of-the-season narrative surrounding the Cubs — that Maddon is a goner and the core players will be broken up — is one team President Theo Epstein tried to shoot down Friday. Epstein's interview with WSCR-AM 670 on Thursday painted a bleak picture, but he was more upbeat Friday and blamed it on a lack of sleep watching the Cubs' late-night West Coast games against the Padres and waking early for his sons' first week of school. "It's not what anyone is thinking about," Epstein said. "We're just thinking about winning. We are where we are. We feel like our talent is about to do a lot of great things this year, and we put ourselves in a position where now we have a really small margin for error. So we're just microfocused on winning each day to get where we want to go."

PAUL SULLIVAN
On the Cubs

BEARS

O-line could use urgent repair job

Unit struggled against Pack despite high expectations

By RICH CAMPBELL

When offensive line coach Harry Hiestand reviewed the Bears' loss to the Packers last week, he identified two opponents his guys struggled to block.

One was the Packers' formidable front seven, led by nose tackle Kenny Clark.

The other, more abstract foe was the reason the veteran line languished as part of the offense's rotten season debut.

"When the expectations are high for all of us as players and coaches and you're not having the success you've anticipated, I think it doubles down a little bit," Hiestand said Tuesday. "That was the sense I got, and we just couldn't work our way out of it."

Hiestand's postmortem of a lamentable performance revealed an offensive line destabilized by expectations. Players focused too much on negative results piling up, he said, instead of reverting to blocking fundamentals to help the offense gain traction.

The Bears surrendered five sacks, were flagged four times on the offensive line for holding or illegal use of the hands and openly regretted not running the ball more.

FIRE

Billionaire takes full ownership

Mansueto buys Hauptman's 51% stake of the MLS team

By TIM BANNON

The Chicago Fire have a new boss.

Joe Mansueto, the billionaire chairman and founder of investment research firm Morningstar, has taken full ownership of the Major League Soccer team.

Mansueto

Andrew Hauptman, who bought the team in 2007 for a reported $35 million and became its chairman, sold his 51% stake to Mansueto, who also takes over as chairman.

The Fire announced the news Friday. In July 2018, Mansueto acquired a 49% stake in the team. Hauptman kept the controlling stake.

"I joined Andrew as a partner because he developed a tremendous platform for continued soccer growth across Chicago and beyond," Mansueto, 63, said in a statement. "He and the entire organization have worked tirelessly to dramatically increase the profile of the Chicago Fire Soccer Club."

"The timing of this transaction couldn't be better as we return the world's game to the city I love. Andrew and his family will always be part of the Fire family that he cares so very much about."

BLACKHAWKS

With 55 players in camp, time to find comfort zone

Plenty of new faces, newfound confidence as training begins

By JIMMY GREENFIELD

The ignition has been switched on and the Blackhawks are finally in motion again after a second straight offseason that lasted more than five months.

Many of the old faces were on hand at Fifth Third Arena when training camp kicked off Friday, including Jonathan Toews, Patrick Kane, Duncan Keith, Corey Crawford and 19 others who played at least one game for the Hawks last season.

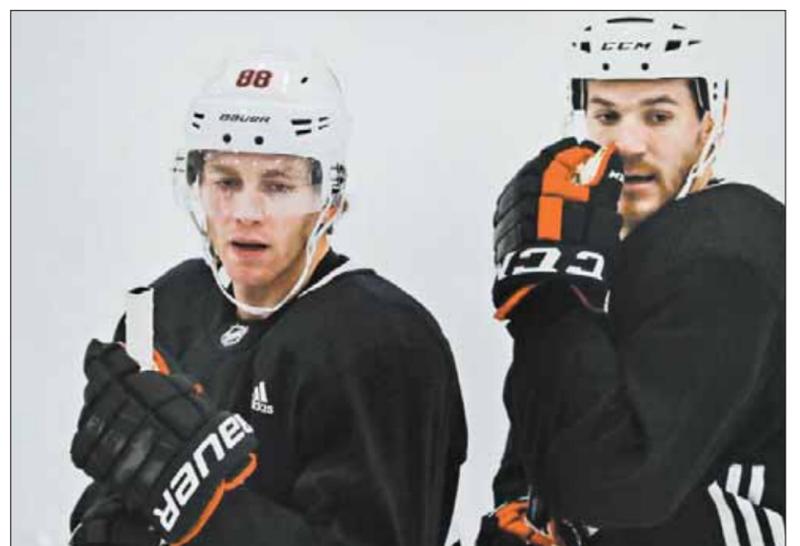

Thus began the mysterious process of blending the standbys with newcomers

Robin Lehner, Calvin de Haan, Olli Maatta, Ryan Carpenter and Zack Smith — as well as Andrew Shaw, who qualifies as both old and new.

The pieces are here. Now it's time to start to put them in place and see if the Hawks consist of elements that fit together in beautiful symmetry or if they will flick the switch and discover a Frankenstein's monster.

Friday's practice was divided into two full sessions of roughly 90 minutes for the 55 players in camp, with Kane going in the morning and Toews in the afternoon. There didn't seem to be a pattern to why some players were in one session and others in another.

TEDDY GREENSTEIN

Will Irish run for the cover?

I loved the 'dogs last week. Thought 12 of 14 would cover. Felt like a real handicapper because the professional analysts are always talking about "value" selections.

Oops. I didn't count on Ohio State to pitch a shutout. And Indiana. And Wisconsin.

Fortunately my efforts did not produce a goose egg.

On to our latest batch of picks against the spread.

Thursday morning odds courtesy of MyBookie.ag. Selections in bold.

Ohio State (minus 17) at Indiana

11 a.m. Saturday, FOX-32
The Hoosiers' Peyton Ramsey has a 92.9 completion percentage — and he's the backup. So let's not assume Ohio State will romp, especially on the road. But the Buckeyes looked scary good last week, certainly too good for me to pick against them.

Pittsburgh (plus 17) at Penn State

11 a.m., ABC-7
Weird stat from last week: Penn State covered the 30-point line against Buffalo despite being outgained by 72 yards. Easy selection here in a rivalry game: Pitt is the pick.

Maryland (minus 7½) at Temple

11 a.m., CBSN
Here's a sneaky-good game that could soar past the total of 66½ points. The Terps lead the nation with 142 points — zero by field goals. Temple, coached by former Northern Illinois chief Rod Carey, dropped 56 on Bucknell in its only game. I'll take the Owls catching this many points with extra rest.

Eastern Michigan (plus 7½) at Illinois

11 a.m., BTN
Can Illinois start 3-0 for the first time since the Ron Zook Experience? Maybe, but something tells me this will be a tight one. Fly with the Eagles.

New Mexico (plus 34½) at Notre Dame

1:30 p.m., NBC-5
The Irish should be able to pick the final score, so the only question is whether they go bland in the second half with a trip to Georgia on deck. I'll say no. Bob Davie will not enjoy watching this one.

UNLV (plus 18½) at Northwestern

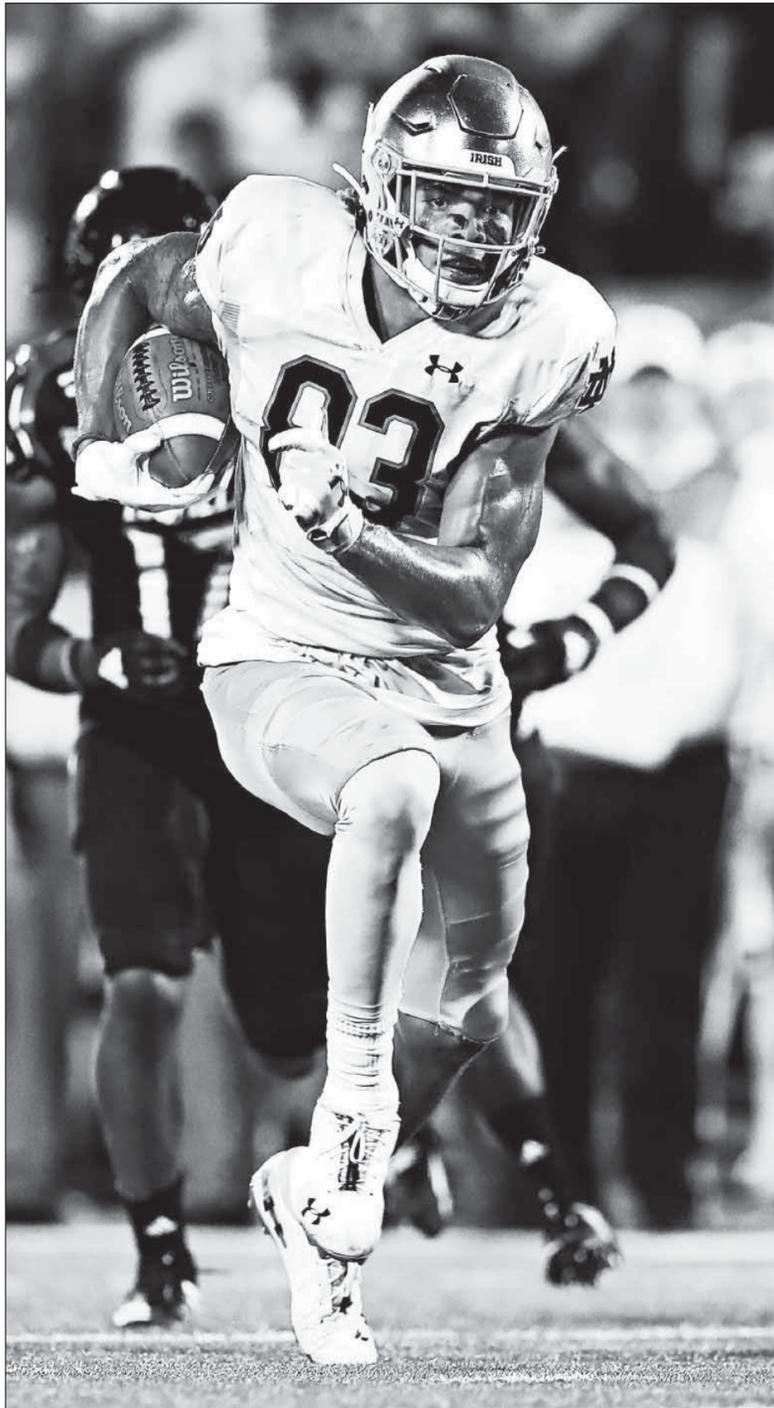

2:30 p.m., BTN
Doesn't matter that the (Runnin'?) Rebels just got trucked by Arkansas State. Northwestern treats September nonconference games as if they're exhibitions, having lost at home to Western Michigan, Illinois State and Akron since 2016. With no students on campus thanks to the quarter system, the crowd will be dead. I'll take Stacey Augmon's alma mater.

Ga. Southern (plus 16½) at Minnesota

2:30 p.m.
Say this for P.J. Fleck: No one has looked better wearing maroon pants with a yellow sweater. His team is also looking good. But Georgia Southern has the rushing attack (469 yards in two games) to keep this relatively tight.

Arizona St. (plus 14½) at Michigan St.

3 p.m., FOX-32
You play to win the game. Hello? Hi, Herm Edwards. One more from the Sun Devils coach: A goal without a plan is a wish. My goal is to go 12-0 this week. My plan is to do just enough research to yield this pick: Sun Devils.

ANDY LYONS/GETTY

Notre Dame's Chase Claypool looks for room to run in the win against Louisville on Sept. 2.

Iowa (minus 2½) at Iowa State

3 p.m., FS1
Odds Shark opened with a line of Iowa State minus 1½, perhaps forecasting a bump from the presence of ESPN's "College GameDay." Iowa supporters replied, "Not so fast, my friend," and swung the spread four points. Tough call in the 125-year-old Cy-Hawk rivalry, but I'll take the Cyclones.

TCU (minus 2½) at Purdue

6:30 p.m., BTN
The Boilermakers opened as 2½-point favorites after spanking Vandy. I have to agree with the masses. TCU comes in fresh, having suited up only once (the Week 1 victim was Arkansas-Pine Bluff). The Boilers lost heart-and-soul linebacker Markus Bailey to a season-ending knee injury, and quarterback Elijah Sindelar is in concussion protocol. Take TCU.

Clemson (minus 28) at Syracuse

6:30 p.m., ABC-7
This spread seems like a greater overreaction than what Mitch Trubisky has faced since the Packers game. Yeah, these Tigers could put up points against the Steel Curtain, but I'll take the four touchdowns with an Orange team playing in its home dome.

NIU (plus 14) at Nebraska

7 p.m., FS1
As you might have read, NIU has had no trouble going mano a mano against the Big Ten, going 4-2 since 2013 with scalps of Iowa, Purdue, Northwestern and, yes, Nebraska. The Huskers tend to play better at night, but I'm still riding the Huskies.

Last week: 4-9-1.
Season total: 13-15-2.

The only downsides were de Haan's absence due to lingering effects from offseason shoulder surgery, which was expected, and Kirby Dach's absence due to being in the NHL's concussion protocol, which was not. Dach was injured Tuesday while playing in the NHL Prospect Tournament in Michigan.

For now, the goal is to get everyone comfortable on the ice with each other and spend a lot of time off the ice studying video and absorbing coach Jeremy Colliton's structures.

"We have some new players that haven't played here before," general manager Stan Bowman said. "And for some of our players last year, it was an adjustment to try and play a different way. So this gives us a chance, day after day, to practice things.

"In time it's going to become second nature, but right now we're not quite there. So it's nice to have a stretch of practices. We can work on new things and build some new habits."

The Oct. 4 season opener in Prague is less than three weeks away, and the Hawks need to whittle the roster to the 22 or 23 players who suit up. Bowman spent the offseason adding depth players on offense and defense, and it sounds like he intends to use them.

"I wouldn't look at it that we're building for one game — the opening night," he said. "All the games matter. But we're going to use a lot of players this year. We've got much better depth than we've had in the past. Building a group of players in Rockford that can come up and help our team is going to help us get where we want to be."

Colliton was named coach 15 games into last season, a little more than a month after training camp ended. There was little time to implement his systems, which never fully took hold despite the Hawks putting together a strong second-half run.

A full camp with three weeks of practice to get the entire organization on the same pace is something Colliton has waited for patiently since he was hired.

"We made a lot of progress (last year), but I don't think we looked at our team and said we've got it all figured out," Colliton said. "All teams, you're constantly evolving how you're going to play and you're putting new things in and you're adapting, and we're going to be no different.

"We have an idea of how we want to play right here, right now, and as the year goes on, you adapt. So we want to make sure we use the time we have currently."

The Hawks are one of 10 teams that missed the playoffs the last two seasons and the only one in the Central Division, which figures once again to be difficult. That hasn't stopped them from beginning camp optimistic they can right a foundering ship.

Sure, that's what all teams are saying this time of year — even the Senators — but the Hawks are improved in a way they weren't last year. The additions are mostly proven NHL veterans in the prime of their careers who have enjoyed both personal and postseason success.

Lehner, de Haan, Maatta and Shaw are a far cry from last year, when the main additions were Cam Ward, Chris Kunitz and Brandon Manning. Ward and Kunitz are now retired, and Manning is no sure thing to earn a spot on the Oilers roster.

"It feels different than the last few years especially," Keith said. "There's lots of turnover every year, but when you bring in guys like Olli Maatta and Calvin de Haan

Top pick Dach suffers concussion

BY JIMMY GREENFIELD

The Blackhawks opened training camp on an ominous note Friday when they announced minutes after camp began that first-round pick Kirby Dach is in the league's concussion protocol, apparently the result of a hit he took this week in the NHL Prospect Tournament.

Dach's bid to make the opening roster will be hampered if he misses extended practice and can't participate in more than a couple of preseason games. The Hawks open their exhibition schedule Monday and play games on three consecutive nights.

"When you have a concussion, the timing on those we don't really know," general manager Stan Bowman said. "It could be short, it could be a day or two, it could be longer.

"It's too bad. I thought he played well (in the prospect tournament) a couple games. But this is part of it and we don't need to make any determinations today. It's the first day of camp, so we'll just let that play out."

(and) Carpenter that come from good organizations, teams that have won before, it's nice to have that experience. They're young guys, too, but (it) gives everyone more confidence in the group."

The early days of camp contain light-hearted banter. All teams are even in the standings and hope abounds. Lehner joked that the Masterton Trophy that had him playing with the Rangers instead of the Islanders would "go out on eBay soon," and Patrick Kane is the last Hawk to make the opening roster in his draft year. He recalled not having a very good training camp in 2007, but it was still a big part of his development.

"It was really a much-needed time for me, but (Dach) might be in a different position," Kane said. "He's a big, strong kid. He can translate pretty well just with his body to the NHL game. The position he's in, you don't really want to rush him back or have him force anything."

Dach, one of four Hawks prospects to leave Tuesday's game in Traverse City, Mich., with an injury, was driven into the boards in the first period and left immediately. Adam Boqvist, Philipp Kurashev and Mikael Hakkarainen also were knocked out of the game.

Kurashev missed practice Friday with what the Hawks called a bruised left knee and shoulder. Boqvist and Hakkarainen practiced without limitation.

Defenseman Calvin de Haan, who underwent shoulder surgery in May, did not practice and is expected to be out two to three weeks.

Kane laughed at the sight of the bobblehead the first 10,000 fans who attend Sunday's Training Camp Festival scrimmage will receive.

The bobblehead depicts Kane in his celebratory dance moments after scoring in overtime to win the 2010 Stanley Cup. The thinking is there's more dancing in the Hawks' future, perhaps sooner than many people think.

"The confidence is a lot higher than it's been the last couple years," Kane said.

Cubs shortstop Nico Hoerner smashes a two-run home run on the first pitch he saw in his first game at Wrigley Field on Friday.

From boos to oohs

After falling into a 4-run hole, the Cubs romp past Pirates with 5 home runs

BY PAUL SULLIVAN

Nico Hoerner walked into the Cubs clubhouse Friday morning at Wrigley Field and reflected on a whirlwind ride that took him from his couch to the big leagues to the Friendly Confines.

"It's not what I expected I'd be doing this week," Hoerner said. "But it's probably the best week of my life, so nothing really to change there. It's been amazing."

Hoerner's Wrigley debut was one he won't soon forget.

The rookie shortstop smoked his first career home run on the first pitch he saw in the first inning, launching the Cubs to a wild 17-8 win before 39,080 dazed and delirious fans, who began the afternoon booing the team's sloppy play in the Pirates' four-run top of the first.

Hoerner wound up with two hits and four RBIs as the Cubs pounded Steven Brault and the Pirates bullpen with five home runs, including two from Willson Contreras.

"Listen, the kid was sitting somewhere on a couch, doing nothing, thinking his season is over," manager Joe Maddon said of Hoerner. "And all of a sudden you get a phone call and you show up in San Diego and you do what you've been doing."

"We know he's good, but beyond that, it's him, (he's) not overwhelmed by anything."

Added starter Jon Lester: "I'm sure he hasn't been able to sleep."

Hoerner is the first Cub in at least 111 years with multiple four-RBI games in his first five games. Will he remain at short when Addison Russell returns from the concussion protocol?

"What Nico is doing right now can't be overlooked," Maddon said.

Aided by a 20-mph wind blowing out to right, Nicholas Castellano started the quick comeback with a two-run shot off Brault, his eighth first-inning homer with the Cubs, cutting the deficit to 4-2.

Contreras followed one out later with the first of his two mammoth homers, and Hoerner's two-run shot gave the Cubs the lead for good.

Anthony Rizzo, leading off for the second straight day, added a grand slam in the third and jumped up onto Lester like it was the World Series after crossing the plate.

"Hey, if he keeps hitting grand slams, he can jump in my arms all he wants," Lester said.

Rizzo's emotional rescue was necessary after another underachieving trip left the Cubs tied for the second National League wild-card spot with the Brewers, who fell a half-game behind pending their game against the Cardinals on Friday night in St. Louis.

Contreras said the first-inning comeback said something about the team's makeup.

"I knew we were going to have a good game," he said. "We were hungry. This clubhouse is full of life and joy. It was just the first inning, we never gave up."

Maddon said playing in laid-back San Diego was difficult for the Cubs' intensity level. Coming home changed everything.

"You've got all this going on (in San Diego), and you don't have this intensity that you have at Wrigley Field or Yankee Stadium or wherever, so you have to create your own energy," he said. "And I know that, and I'm watching this (Wednesday), so by the end of the game I wanted to make sure I put the message out here somehow that we can not permit that to happen and we have to create our own energy.

"And if you're going to be uptight about stuff, boys, we ain't playing much longer."

Lester managed to get through five innings for his 13th win, allowing seven runs (four earned) on 11 hits. Defensive miscues by Contreras and Albert Almora Jr. contributed to his struggles, but Lester also was his own worst enemy at times.

After letting the Pirates creep back in the fifth, he picked up a fistful of dirt and threw it down in disgust. Lester said he just needed to let his emotions out.

"That's why you get kind of who I am out there," he said.

The Cubs rallied again in the fifth after the inning seemingly ended on a Kris Bryant groundout and players were getting ready to take the field. The Cubs challenged, the call was overturned and they added seven two-out runs, including Horner's two-run double and Jason Heyward's pinch-hit, three-run double.

The players know what's at stake this week, and team President Theo Epstein said there was no need for him to talk to them.

"I've done group things in the past," he said. "If you get to a point where someone in a suit or cheap-collared shirt is addressing the team, you've got bigger problems."

Sullivan

"Every year there is consequences, and every year it's important as an executive and leader to step back and see the big picture and where you are as an organization and not overreact to anything. People know enough about this organization, they don't think we're hyper-reactive or anything like that.

"We're realistic about where we are, what we've done. We're accountable and we want to try and get it right. At the end of every year there's a process of trying to figure out what you can do better, what direction you need to go, but that's not enveloping this club at all. We're just trying to win games."

Epstein said Maddon has "done a great job" of not letting any of the job speculation become a "distraction." Now that the season is winding down and the Cubs are fighting for a wild-card spot, speculation has been nonstop.

Maddon said he wasn't thinking about the possibility of this being his final homestand as Cubs manager.

"I'm all about next year," he said. "Everybody else has talked about it, but I don't think I have."

Maddon said he knew "the whole year was going to be speculation" about his future, so the last few weeks will be no different.

"Absolutely, and I'm fine with it," he said. "I have no issues with it whatsoever. I get it, and it's just a natural part of the landscape in (an end of the contract) situation."

So what's wrong with his team? Maddon said the players were playing "tight" of late and that he's trying to get them to relax.

"Before you walk out there, set your hair on fire and see what happens," he said.

In the first inning, Cubs starter Jon Lester allowed four runs to put everyone on edge. Willson Contreras threw a ball into center field as Kevin Newman tried to steal second on what became a walk, and Newman scored when Albert Almora Jr. made an errant throw to the infield. After a lineout to center from Melky Cabrera, Almora made another wayward toss to the infield, though the runner didn't advance.

But the Cubs bounced back in the bottom of the first, scoring five runs on homers by Nicholas Castellanos, Contreras and rookie Nico Hoerner — in his first Wrigley Field at-bat. Contreras homered again to lead off the third and Anthony Rizzo added a grand slam to extend the lead to 10-4, and the rout was on.

Epstein a day earlier called the team's play "uninspired" during his interview with the "Mully & Haugh Show." Asked about that description, Maddon said he could understand how someone might see it that way from watching on TV.

"When you play uptight, it's very difficult," Maddon said. "Our guys care so much. That's my interpretation. I can easily see why that would be said (by Epstein). But I don't think it's true. I want us to loosen up and play baseball, and if we're able to do that over the next two weeks we'll get the result we're looking for."

Epstein said Maddon, the coaches and the front office all have "different ways of expressing" their frustrations, and he was only saying how he felt personally.

"I don't believe in hiding the ball and saying everything is great when things aren't," Epstein said. "I still believe in this group. Most importantly we have a chance to write our own story here, and sometimes it's better late than never. You'd like to have a season where things really go your way and you can separate a little bit, but that hasn't been our path this year. There's a lot of time for that after we're done playing, hopefully in November, when we can talk about why."

"I'm the first one accountable for it. I run the baseball operation here, so if I'm upset with anything, I'm upset with myself."

"But that's not the story. The story is we're tied for the playoff spot, we have seven games left against the team we're (trailing) in the division and we have a really talented group of guys that hasn't put it all together yet. But we can, and we're planning on making that happen."

White Sox ace Lucas Giolito "got into a nice groove" during his strikeout binge.

Giolito's day one for the record books

BY LAMOND POPE

Here are four takeaways from the White Sox-Royals series at Guaranteed Rate Field, where the Sox won one of three games.

1. Lucas Giolito joins an elite list.

It's not every day someone is mentioned in the same sentence as Tom Seaver.

Lucas Giolito struck out eight consecutive batters during Thursday's 6-3 loss, adding his name to a top-10 list.

The eight consecutive strikeouts set a single-game team record. It's also tied for the seventh-best mark in major-league history. Seaver holds the record with 10 consecutive strikeouts against the Padres on April 22, 1970.

"I just got into a nice groove, good rhythm, executing pitches especially with two strikes, putting it where I wanted to," Giolito said.

Giolito did make a couple of costly mistakes, surrendering two homers in a loss he said was "on me." He allowed five runs on five hits in six innings.

Overall, he struck out 12. His 11.62 strikeouts per nine innings is the second-best mark in Sox history behind Chris Sale's 11.82 in 2015.

"When his mechanics are right, he's going to fill up the strike zone," Sox catcher James McCann said, "and with his elite pitches, that's going to be good."

2. Learning lesson for Reynaldo Lopez.

Reynaldo Lopez's last four starts have had their ups and downs.

He threw five no-hit innings Aug. 25 against the Rangers but had to exit because of dehydration and flu-like symptoms. He lasted just two-thirds of an inning Aug. 31 against the Braves, allowing six runs on six hits.

Lopez then rebounded with one of the best games of his career Sept. 5, striking out 11 in a one-hit complete-game win against the Indians.

That momentum didn't carry over to Wednesday. Lopez surrendered four homers in the 8-6 loss. He allowed six runs on nine hits in 4²/₃ innings.

Manager Rick Renteria suggested Lopez might have been too excited trying to duplicate the outing against the Indians.

"I was trying to make my pitches nastier than what they usually are," Lopez said through an interpreter. "That generated a chain of mistakes. When you do that here, you pay for it. And I paid for it."

Lopez also mentioned pitching too quickly, which led to a difficult time picking up the target from catcher Welington Castillo. It's all part of the growing process.

"That will all come together," Lopez said. "This is still a learning process and I'm learning."

3. Tim Anderson makes an impact on and off the field.

Sox shortstop Tim Anderson remains atop the American League with a .333 average. He went 2-for-5 Thursday and has hit safely in 10 of his last 11 games. He has a .400 average (20-for-50) during that stretch.

His impact doesn't end when the games are over. Anderson is the team nominee for the 2019 Roberto Clemente Award, Major League Baseball announced in a news release Thursday.

The award recognizes a player who, according to the release, "represents the game of baseball through extraordinary character, community involvement, philanthropy and positive contributions, both on and off the field."

The winner will be announced at a later date.

4. The Sox eye a more consistent 2020.

The Sox won season series against the two best teams in the American League, going 4-3 against the Yankees and Astros.

But they also dropped the season series to the Royals (10-9), who have 92 losses. It's the first time the Royals won the season series with the Sox since 2016.

The Sox (64-82) have won more games than they did last season, but they will finish under .500 for the seventh consecutive season. They haven't had a winning record since 2012.

A reporter asked Renteria if better times are ahead.

"We are trying to win," Renteria said Thursday. "I know there's still refining to do, but I'll be honest with you, we are finishing this season, we are talking about coming into next season ready to battle. Period. Exclamation point."

Bears kicker Eddy Pineiro, right, celebrates with teammates after making a 38-yard field goal against the Packers at Soldier Field.

Getting a kick out of Pineiro

Special teams coach Tabor impressed by confident rookie

BY DAN WIEDERER

When Chris Tabor reviewed the TV copy of the Week 1 loss, the Bears special teams coordinator zeroed in to assess Eddy Pineiro's mannerisms as he headed onto Soldier Field for the first regular-season field-goal attempt of his NFL career. It was a tiny detail. But when Pineiro, in mid-jog, turned to his left and fist bumped holder Pat O'Donnell, it meant something to Tabor.

"Just that 'Let's go' deal," Tabor said. "With that moment, I thought, 'OK, this doesn't look too big for him. He's zeroed in on what he needs to do.' ... That's why you love him. He's genuine. He cares. He's working hard."

And when Pineiro crunched a 38-yard field goal right down the pipe and into net in the north end zone, the NBC camera caught Tabor's reaction. Scrunched nose, slight squint, closed mouth. Ultraconfident nod.

"It was a sense of determination," Tabor said. "And I felt that for him. Because I know he can do this. I just know he can."

Pineiro's 1-for-1 start sure beat the alternative. Yet questions linger as to why the young kicker didn't get a second attempt against the Packers. Rather than attempt a 51-yard kick in a 7-3 game, coach Matt Nagy opted to go for it on fourth-and-10 late in the third quarter, explaining later that the move was based heavily on "the number," that pregame range Tabor provided.

Fifty-one yards, the Bears had decided collectively, was too risky for Pineiro kicking toward Soldier Field's south end zone. Nagy made it clear that had the kick been from 46 yards, Pineiro would have had the green light.

Still, after originally framing "the number" as a hard-and-fast rule, Nagy later indicated there's wiggle room, up to his discretion based on the situation. Time and score. The opponent. The type of game it has been. Et cetera.

Thus the Bears coach made the executive decision that pushing to score a touchdown on that drive meant more to him than potentially cutting the Packers' lead to 7-6.

"There are so many variables," Nagy said.

As for the pregame process, Tabor watches Pineiro kick, judges his accuracy, his ball flight and his consistency and takes notes on the strength and direction of the wind.

Pineiro offers input too. "We get some distance," the kicker said, "and go back and see how far and where my ball's kind of moving from 50, 55, 53. And then we determine a distance (range)."

Tabor said not all made kicks pregame are treated equally. "If it goes through ugly, and it's a bad make, you've got to play with all of that," he said.

Without giving away the detailed nuances of kicking at Soldier Field, Tabor stressed that kicking south is different than north. He pointed out that Packers kicker Mason Crosby had two touchbacks on kickoffs to the north last week that flew to the back of the end zone and bounced through. Crosby's only kickoff to the south was a line drive that bounced near the 16-yard line.

Tabor isn't worried about last week's decisions.

"Our number was set based off of the pregame and the wind," Tabor said. "Eddy missed (a long) one. And then he came back and hit another one and hit it about as good as he can get it. And we thought, OK, right in here is where we're playing this number. ... And you have to live by that number. Talking to a lot of special teams guys who have had young kickers, they all stress being disciplined on your number. That's a big help."

Tabor understands why there is some outside worry that the Bears couldn't lean on a kicker with impressive leg strength to try a 51-yard field goal on a relatively calm night in early September.

"I'm not worried about his leg strength. At all," Tabor said. "(On Wednesday) at practice, he nailed a 57-yarder with a wind at our back. So I'm not concerned about that. But there are other factors. And No. 1, we didn't make it to our line. Were we close? Yes, we were. ... But now what if he misses and we give Aaron Rodgers a short field? And now he goes down and scores and it's 14-3. ... That's a little tougher deal for us now."

The expectation, obviously, is that the Bears' number will be bigger Sunday in Denver, where the altitude and thin air will increase Pineiro's range. It will be interesting to see how that influences Nagy's game management. It will be equally interesting to keep tabs on the Bears' pregame routine.

Nagy hopes Burton can face Broncos

TE listed as questionable as he deals with groin pain

BY RICH CAMPBELL

Bears tight end Trey Burton participated in a limited capacity in all three practices this week, leaving coach Matt Nagy optimistic he will be available Sunday against the Broncos. Burton was listed as questionable on the final injury report.

After practice Friday, Nagy emphasized that the decision on whether to play is not Burton's alone. Trainers will have input after he tests his ailing groin before the game.

"Hopefully he's good to go, and if he is, we're prepared," Nagy said. "And if for whatever reason he's not ... that's not going to affect our game plan. We're still prepared."

Burton ran on the field before the Sept. 5 opener against the Packers but did not play. He sat out the first of three practices that week, an inauspicious sign. At least this week he was on the field all three days.

"I feel better this week than I did last week at this time," Nagy said. "That's by no means saying that he's going to play. I'm not saying that. But what I'm saying is I definitely feel better right now, today, than I did last week at this time."

Burton spoke to reporters Thursday for the first time since the groin injury sidelined him late in the preseason.

"Waking up every day, I just don't know how I'm going to feel," Burton said.

"Obviously I would like to feel really good. Mentally I can't sit on the bench any longer, but my body hasn't caught up to that."

In other injury news, nose tackle Eddie Goldman returned to practice after sitting out Thursday with an oblique injury he suffered during practice Wednesday.

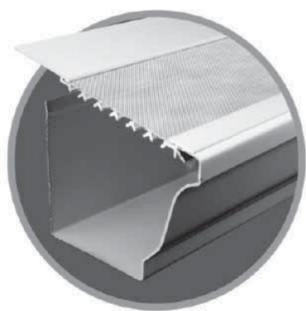

Inside linebacker Nick Kwiatkoski was added to the injury report with a knee injury he suffered in practice, but Nagy characterized it as minor. He and Goldman are listed as questionable.

Defensive lineman Bilal Nichols had his usual reduction in practice reps Friday to help his knee. He's listed as questionable but expected to play.

Players and coaches have taken turns raising their hands to accept blame, and Hiestand offered an honest critique of his group, confident in its ability to reset for Sunday's road game against coach Vic Fangio's Broncos.

"You have to be able to focus on things that help you and don't focus on, 'Jeez, we should be gaining more yards than that,' or, 'Jeez, he just got sacked,'" Hiestand said.

"Just focus on doing your job and using the technique that you worked on. Play together as a unit and you'll work your way through it. We just never worked our way through it."

Hiestand's repair job began with self-criticism regarding one of the game's low points for the offensive line.

The Bears had third-and-1 in Packers territory in the second quarter. They were driving to retake the lead after the Packers had scored a touchdown to go ahead 7-3.

Coach Matt Nagy called a handoff to kickoff returner Cordarrelle Patterson, a personnel choice Nagy defended by citing Patterson's proven toughness as a ball carrier and ability to break tackles.

"We could've had Walter Payton back there and he wasn't getting anything," Nagy said Friday. "It wouldn't have mattered."

The reason? Clark swam past new center James Daniels and tackled Patterson in the backfield.

Clark normally plays a two-gap technique, meaning he accounts for the lane on each side of the center. But he stunted on the short-yardage run, jetting past Daniels with quickness that belied his 314-pound frame.

"I didn't prepare him for that pressure in that front," Hiestand said. "He was playing it like a normal two-gapper ... so that one looked really, really bad on him."

Daniels, meanwhile, processed it as one of several learning experiences in his first start at center since two seasons ago at Iowa.

"I have to expect that he's going to do something like that," Daniels said. "When you're blocking a player like that, you know every play you have to be on or he's going to beat you."

The list of negative plays was too long for anyone's liking in the offensive line's meeting room.

The holding penalty against Kyle Long. Right guard Cody Whitehair getting blocked back by Clark into the path of tight end Ben Braunecker, which wrecked a potential shovel pass. The hit on quarterback Mitch Trubisky that turned a potential late touchdown pass to running back Mike Davis into an underthrown incomplection.

"We were pressing a little bit, trying to make the big play," left tackle Charles Leno said. "You've got to let that stuff go, just take care of the simple stuff and execute the technique that's used."

For Hiestand, that was the focus of practice this week.

Fundamentals such as targeting a block in a specific part of a defender's body to prevent him from taking a quicker, inside route to the quarterback.

Linemen regrouping their hands as a play progresses to ensure Trubisky has time and space to throw downfield on plays that take a bit longer to develop. And, of course, making sure run blocks are solid so Nagy has confidence in calling runs.

"It's important that our pads are lower than their pads," Hiestand explained. "You can't give (defenders) a lot of surface to grab onto or hook onto. Because it's easier to grab when you're higher and moving laterally than it is when you're lower and moving forward."

As the Bears see it, these are problems within their control. Fixing them fast is the only way forward because the expectations for this season aren't going anywhere.

"Hopefully we limit the human error and the mental lapses," Long said. "The game is hard enough. Make it so they have to beat us. Don't beat ourselves."

SOCCER

CHRIS WALKER/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Billionaire Joe Mansueto, 63, has made big plans as he takes full ownership of the Fire.

Fire

The Fire, who reached a deal with Bridgeview in July to leave SeatGeek Stadium, have moved a step closer to playing at Soldier Field as soon as next year.

The Chicago Park District voted at its monthly board meeting Wednesday to continue negotiations and enter into a permit and operating agreement for the Fire to use the 61,500-seat stadium starting in the 2020 MLS season.

"What the Fire has achieved has been transformational for the club and the city of Chicago," Hauptman, the chairman of private investment firm Andell Inc., said in a statement. "We've significantly increased soccer's presence and built an ecosystem that rivals any club across North America."

"I'm extremely proud of the positioning of the club at this historic juncture. I know that the next step of returning to Soldier Field will make Chicago proud and I look forward to cheering on Joe, the club and its supporters as they continue this legacy."

Financial details of the deal were not disclosed. In 2016, Forbes valued the team at $240 million.

Mansueto was the first new Fire investor since Hauptman bought the team from Anschutz Entertainment Group.

"It's hard to imagine a better partner for me and our club than Joe," Hauptman said last year. "In addition to decades of experience as a respected business builder and leader, Joe brings a passion for soccer and cares deeply about the city of Chicago."

Mansueto was born in East Chicago, Ind., and graduated from high school in nearby Munster. He has bachelor's and master's degrees in business from the University of Chicago.

Mansueto founded Morningstar in 1984 and stepped down as CEO at the end of 2016. He also owns the financial publications Inc. and Fast Company and is on the board of the Art Institute of Chicago and Northwestern Memorial Hospital. Forbes has estimated Mansueto's net worth at $3.8 billion.

According to a 2012 Chicago Tribune profile, he once coached grade-school soccer in Chicago.

CHICAGO WEATHER CENTER

chicagoweathercenter.com | BY TOM SKILLING AND WGN9

SATURDAY, SEPT. 14

NORMAL HIGH: 76°

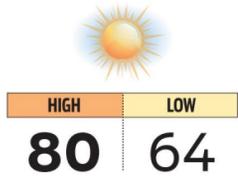

NORMAL LOW: 55°

RECORD HIGH: 99° (1939)

RECORD LOW: 40° (1985)

Warm, dry weekend to follow recent deluges

LOCAL FORECAST

■ A picture-perfect start to a mid-September weekend.

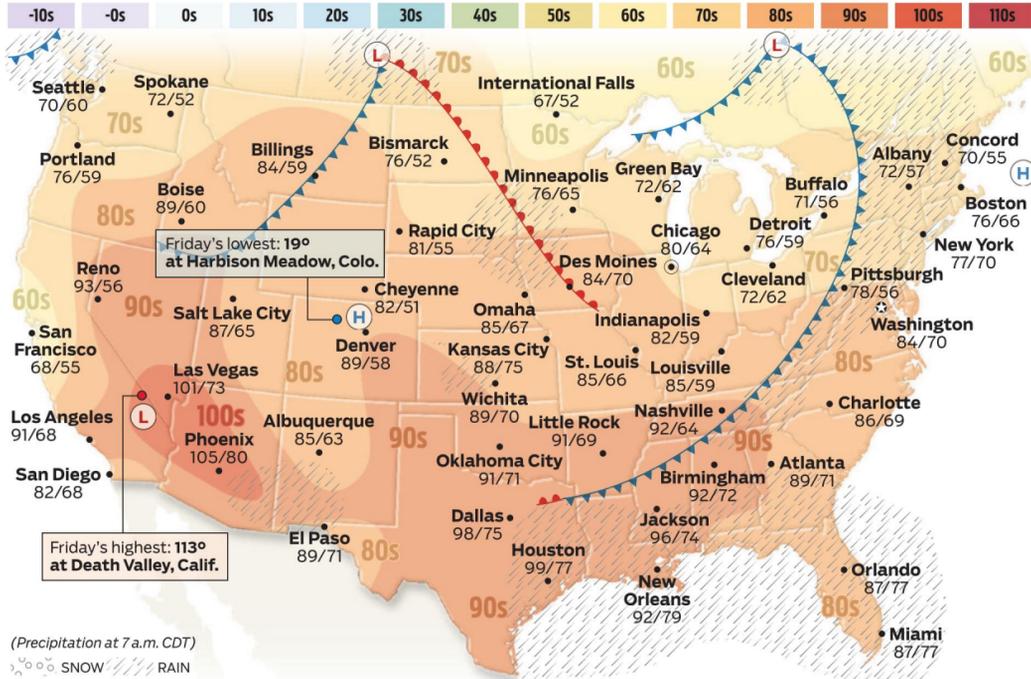

■ Unlimited sunshine under nearly cloudless skies.

■ Following a cool start in the middle and upper 50s, afternoon highs top out around 80 degrees accompanied by southwest winds 8-15 mph and comfortable humidity.

■ Some clouds develop overnight with chance of an isolated thunderstorm developing, affecting less than 20 percent of the area.

■ Lows range from around 60 well inland to the middle 60s downtown.

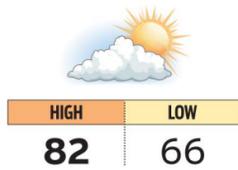

NATIONAL FORECAST

The Chicago area will be treated to a warm, sunny and generally dry weekend, allowing north portions of the metro area a chance to dry out. Repeat deluges swamped portions of the area Wednesday and Thursday nights, with many locations receiving upward of 6 inches of rain, which flooded basements and viaducts, closed roads and sent rivers into flood. The heaviest Thursday night totals were recorded in locations from Wisconsin south to the northern suburbs, with 4 inches logged at Capron, Belvidere and Elgin. Amounts tapered off sharply to the south, with 1.35 inches at O'Hare, 0.68 inches at Midway and 0.53 inches at Oak Forest.

Weekend temps will have highs reaching the lower 80s. Little, if any, rain is expected, though an isolated thunderstorm can't be ruled out.

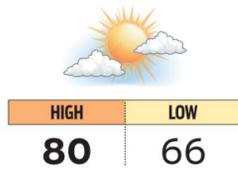

SUNDAY, SEPT. 15

Partly sunny and breezy. Modestly warmer and a bit more humid. An isolated afternoon/evening thunderstorm possible. Southwest winds 12-22 mph.

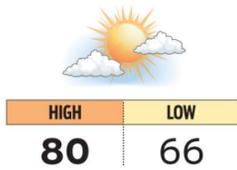

MONDAY, SEPT. 16

Delightful early-fall weather continues. Morning clouds depart early, then mostly sunny and warm. Highs near 80, but light east winds keep lakeshore readings in the lower 70s.

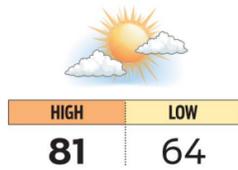

TUESDAY, SEPT. 17

Another fine day. Sunny and warm with inland highs peaking around 80, but once again east winds keep lakeside locations in the 70s.

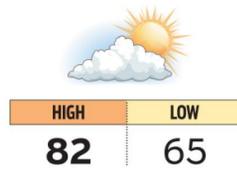

WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 18

A sunny start, but mid and high-level clouds increase in the afternoon. Highs reach the lower 80s, but again a bit lower near the lake with increasing southeast winds.

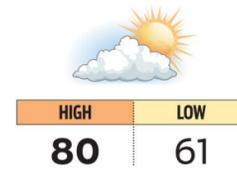

THURSDAY, SEPT. 19

Warm weather continues, but with increasing humidity. Building afternoon cumulus clouds lead to some isolated afternoon/evening thunderstorms.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 20

Partly sunny, warm and more humid. Some thunderstorm possible by evening, but a better chance overnight. Southwest winds 10-20 mph shift northwest at night.

ASK TOM

Dear Tom,
With global warming well underway, what is the status of ice floating in the Arctic Ocean?

Alex Jennis, Racine, Wisconsin

Dear Alex,

The outlook is bleak. The strongest and thickest ice in the Arctic Ocean has begun to break up for the first time in recorded history. This is in an area immediately north of Greenland, where ocean water normally remains frozen throughout the year. This "last ice area" was assumed to be the final place in the Northern Hemisphere to remain frozen, but abnormally high temps this year have been melting the ice, and winds blowing across the Arctic have shifted the ice away from the coastline. "In the past, most of the ice in the Arctic has been multiyear ice. Now nearly all the ice in the Arctic is first-year ice," says ice scientist Peter Wadhams of Cambridge University.

Meet Taycan, Porsche's first all-electric sports car

Porsche chose Niagara Falls to introduce its new Taycan. The thundering waterfall can turn out 2.5 million kilowatts of hydropower — a powerful source of sustainable energy and a potent symbol for a product that aspires to be nearly pollution-free.

Another, more subtle reason for the backdrop: the two statues of Nikola Tesla looking down on the festivities, one from the Canadian side, the other from the U.S. side. Niagara Falls is the site where Tesla first tested his controversial alternating current electrical distribution system in the late 19th century, so there are Tesla memorials all over the place.

The Taycan is a billion-dollar bet on an electric-drive future, the first in what the high-end German car company hopes will be a long line of battery-powered high-performance cars and sport utility vehicles. And it is perhaps the most potent challenger yet to electric-car king Tesla Inc.

First, though, the car must pass muster with Porsche's high-end customers and their sky-high expectations. With the Taycan, the company seeks a reputation for quality and performance on par with internal-combustion classics such as its storied 911 series. And its reception here in California — which accounts for 25% of Porsche sales in the U.S. — will be crucial.

So far, so good — the company says more than 20,000 have been ordered, with current production plans at 40,000 cars a year. In California, customer delivery begins in December.

The Taycan rockets from 0 to 60 in 2.6 to 3 seconds, with a range estimated close to 240 miles. (The Environmental Protection Agency has yet to release official U.S. government range figures.) Most readers of this article won't be able to afford one. There are two models, with base prices at $150,000 and $185,000.

At that price, the Taycan has few, if any, direct competitors. Porsche is hoping to sell most of its Taycans to buyers who've never bought an electric vehicle before.

If it steals sales from another electric car model, that will be the Tesla Model S, the four-door luxury electric sedan that put Tesla on the map in 2012. The S took the world by storm, but it hasn't been given a major body refresh in seven years and no longer is the hot new thing. Model S sales topped out in the last quarter of 2018 and have declined since then as attention as shifted to the less-expensive Model 3. (Its performance is regularly enhanced with over-the-air updates and occasional mechanical improvements.)

Still, the top, Performance version of the Model S outperforms the Taycan in range (345 miles) and a 0-to-60 time (2.4 seconds), at a cost of $100,000 to $120,000.

Porsche executives believe that performance-oriented drivers interested in going electric will gravitate to the Taycan because of the famed track-worthy driving dynamics the company has been perfecting since Ferdinand Porsche began building race cars in the 1920s. Stefan Weckbach, the company's vice president for electric-drive cars, is so confident that the Taycan holds a unique position in the marketplace that he calls it "the world's first fully electric sports car."

There's the latest hot new toy factor to consider too.

"I really think Mr. Musk did a fine job of showing the (big auto companies) that this electric thing could happen," said Danny McKenna, owner of McKenna Porsche in Norwalk. "People wanted that Tesla parked in their driveway. Now, they'll want that Porsche parked there."

Outsiders will test those assumptions. Car & Driver, Road & Track, Motor Trend and the rest of the car enthusiast magazines will be putting the Taycan up against the Model S and a number of other performance cars, both electric and liquid-fuel, to see whether the electric Taycan truly possesses what the company calls "Porsche DNA." (This writer, after a high G-force passenger seat ride with a professional driver around Porsche's Atlanta test track, predicts thumbs up from reviewers across the board.)

Long-term, customer demand for the car will tell the tale.

The market for expensive performance sports cars is tiny: 0.1% of cars sold in the U.S., according to Edmunds. So even if buyers love it, and it sells 40,000 around the world every year, the Taycan will serve Porsche as an image leader, not a massive profit generator. Porsche now makes most of its money with the Cayenne SUV and the Macan crossover. (Porsche has marked the Macan crossover for its next all-electric treatment.)

By selling 40,000 cars a year for prices nearing $200,000 each, the company can make some money while maintaining a less-than-mass-market mystique.

"In terms of profits, this will not be the linchpin of their future," said Jessica Caldwell, automotive marketing analyst at Edmunds. "Now, what's the trickle-down strategy? How do you materialize the Taycan into a larger business for yourself?"

The Taycan — which was simultaneously unveiled at Niagara Falls, in Germany, and in China — comes in two models, named the Turbo and the Turbo S. Which provokes the question "How can a car be called Turbo if a turbocharger is an internal combustion power booster with no relation whatsoever to an electric drive train?"

The Taycan is equipped with two permanent-magnet motors that together produce 625 horsepower. An "overboost" mode is one element that distinguishes the Turbo and the Turbo S. From a standing start, overboost can power out with 680 and 761 horses, respectively. (The word Taycan, as Porsche tells it, derives from ancient Turkic and means "spirited young horse.")
